elect of the board, said. "If the individual was rude to the staff or the individual residents (we might) have them write a letter of apology."

Students also could be asked to make a bulletin board about the dangers of binge drinking or prepare a program for residents. Sanctions could be as severe as removing the student from the residence halls, although Glick said he didn't think that had ever happened solely because of drinking violations.

"If an individual comes before the board, the experience is going to scare them enough to where they won't show up again," Glick said. "Or they'll show up again but not for the same violations."

Glick estimated 25 percent of the residents who come before the board are there for drinking violations, most of which are for underage drinking. The board does a good job of dealing with these residents, Hajdar said.

"Generally, the Judicial Board wants to help educate the residents," Hajdar said. "The main goal of the residence halls is not just to enforce the rules but to educate them for life."

Band incorporates raw energy into surprisingly strong release with its killer songwriting and infectious beat. It's got a traditional feel, as well as a more contemporary sound. All the instruments sound full and work well together. Vocalist/rhythm guitarist Justin "Juddy" Hopper's smooth crooning pulls it all together. What a great way to kick off the CD.

"Devil Blues" is a nice harmonica-accented number that leans heavily on the blues but doesn't lose the ska. It's a brash tune that's full of swagger and attitude with lyrics like, "Any devil that made whiskey ain't no devil of mine. Ain't no devil that made woman, it was God above."

Lead guitarist Sean Whelan's solo is a cool, sloppy take on the blues that fits really well.

"Smith Kidd" shows the B-3s rockin' it steady in an instrumental way that's sure to get you out of your seat and moving.

The horn sound on "New Orleans" is really huge, even though there's only three horn players: saxophonist Scott "Brew" Killebrew, Bill Fulmer on trombone, and trumpeter Mike "The Kid" Shockling.

It's a fun, upbeat song with catchy "whoa-oh-oh" choruses. Drummer Joelle Levitt's drumming on this song, in particular, is really good.

This CD is absolutely wonderful in every aspect. This is definitely a highly recommended, five-star release.

Now, if only they'd quit their day jobs and tour.

Oh well, looks like I'll have to move to Pittsburgh.

Hazing suspected in assault

"It's very premature to make a prediction at this time," Cowley said. "It could just be a matter of days or weeks, but it is remotely possible that it will be indefinite."

While Harris remains in the hospital, the Riley County Police Department continues to investigate the case. It has not made any arrests, nor does it expect to make any before the case has been examined by the county attorney. The RCPD estimates that any arrests are still several days away.

Bosco, however, wasted no time in making his opinion clear on the issue. He suspended the chapter effective noon Monday. Bosco said he is treating the fraternity just as he would treat any other student organization.

"We don't tolerate this kind of activity," he said. "Never have, never will."

The fraternity has existed at K-State since the 1960s and has had an annual membership ranging between two and 10 members. There were four members this year.

Expulsion proceedings must now be initiated by the Multicultural Student Organizations office and the National Pan-Hellenic Council, which governs traditionally black fraternities and sororities at K-State.

The chapter will not be subject to any punishment from Greek Affairs or the Interfraternity Council, Cade Keenan, president of IFC, said.

"Kappa Alpha Psi is not a member of the IFC," Keenan said. "We have absolutely zero jurisdiction or responsibility here. Our hands are tied."

Harris' father, Ernest Harris Sr., said his son's injuries seemed to have been caused by a severe beating or lashing with a paddle. He also said the beating took place at the home of one of his son's fraternity brothers.

Ernest L. Harris Jr., who graduated from K-State in December 1997 with a degree in business administration, is not the first member of Kappa Alpha Psi's national organization to suffer from alleged hazing-related injuries.

The fraternity recently has been linked with incidents involving possible hazing at Southeast Missouri State University and Maryland-Eastern Shore.

Bosco said K-State's chapter had been a good chapter over the years. He also said only one member of the fraternity was present when the incident took place, but he still felt the suspension was warranted.

Veryl Switzer, Kappa Alpha Psi's adviser, was unavailable for comment, and members refused comment as the investigation continues.

Aggieville bars feel crunch of MIPs

BARBARA HOLLINGSWORTH
Kansas State Collegian

While the term minor in possession can bring fear to drinkers younger than 21, Aggieville bars also know its consequences.

Lucky BrewGrille will have its liquor license suspended May 25-28, and it won't be the only bar not serving alcohol that week. KJ's Bar & Dance Club's owner, Jeff Fellows, has decided to shut his doors during KJ's suspension, May 24-31.

"Financially, it hurts you," Fellows said. "You've got to tighten up. You can get shut down all the time and be fined $1,000 for each MIP. No businessman wants that. You've got to card as hard as you can."

In the past few years, Alcoholic Beverage Control has stepped up its enforcement in Manhattan. In addition to sending agents to look for minors in Aggieville, it has started sending underage people into bars to buy alcohol.

"We still have some licensees that are selling to underage persons," said Dean Reynoldson, enforcement manager for the Kansas Department of Revenue, which oversees ABC. "They are getting better, but we're not going to be satisfied until they are all in compliance."

He said Manhattan's situation is similar to Lawrence's.

"Any time you have a large representation of underage persons in a college town like Manhattan, the rate of sales to underage persons is high," he said. "So we focus our efforts in Manhattan to control the situation as best we can."

While ABC might make six or seven visits to Aggieville during the year, the Riley County Police Department tries to control underage drinking on a daily basis. The substation is open Tuesday through Saturday night and early Sunday morning. Officer Michael Boller, who works in RCPD's Aggieville substation, said when officers do bar checks they check each bar and can find as many as two MIP violations per officer.

"We'll go into a bar to do a bar check. We'll walk around, and we're looking for someone to give us a reaction," Boller said. "They'll try to put the beer down. They'll try to walk away from us."

Those responses can give the officer probable cause to ask for an ID. Officers check the lamination of the ID and also look for the Kansas hologram.

"It's just a matter of running that through dispatch as well," he said. "We deal with both

Ernest L. Harris Jr., who graduated from K-State in December 1997, will undergo kidney dialysis to treat his injuries, Dr. Ben Cowley said. No time frame has been set for his release.

Meanwhile, Capt. Steve French of the Riley County Police Department said no arrests have been made in the case.

French also said none will be made until the case has been presented to the district attorney for review.

As the investigation continues, the incident's effect on K-State's greek community has become a concern of many of the people involved with the fraternity system.

Commission addresses land needs

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan City Commission caught two glimpses of the future of Manhattan and city government Tuesday — architectural plans for the new Colbert Hills Golf Course and a new ordinance that would allow two commissioners to talk city business outside of a public forum.

Commissioner approved first reading of two ordinances that would annex 392.4 acres for the proposed Colbert Hills Golf Course shortly after being told that golf courses normally require 160 acres of land by a representative of architectural firm of Downing, Thorpe, Jones in Boulder, Colo.

Though development of the golf course is still in the early planning stages, land is being acquired from private landowners who own tracts on the course site, and the Colorado architectural firm will submit a more comprehensive plan for Colbert Hills to commission on May 23.

While the appearance of outer Manhattan will change as the course develops, so might the rules that apply to city commissioners.

Commissioners approved a charter ordinance exempting Manhattan from Student slowly recovers after March crosswalk accident

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Crutches, a walking cast, physical therapy and a dependence upon others are a few things to which Mindy Hines has had to adjust in the past five weeks.

After being hit by a car at a Denison Avenue crosswalk on March 4, she said she has made progress, but had to make some significant changes to get to where she is now.

"I have always been very free and independent," said Hines, freshman in music and theater. "It's hard to be that way when you wear an air cast and walk around on crutches."

Hines recalls one night when she forgot she couldn't walk as she normally did.

"I remember that one night I was asleep and someone knocked on my door, so I jumped up and I fell right back down," she said. "I always thought I could handle everything, but I have realized that there are just some things that I have to be dependent on, and I don't like that."

One of Hines' friends, Tiffany Gunderson, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said Hines has bad days and sometimes gets depressed.

"Mindy hates to be known as the girl who got hit in the crosswalk," Gunderson said. "At first she didn't like it when people opened doors for her, but she soon realized that she would have to depend on others because she couldn't do it herself."

Through all of her struggles and pain, Hines has managed school quite well.

"I only missed a total of seven days of school," Hines said. "But I did have to drop two classes."

She said she was shocked at the number of people whocame to visit her.

"People came in groups of 15 to see me," she said. "All of my teachers except one came to see me, and even Pat Bosco came, which I thought was really neat."

Hines said Ashlie Huston, the woman who struck her with her car, came to the hospital and has called her.

"She hit me because the lighting in the area is terrible," she said.

"I don't have any hard feeling over what has happened because it was an accident."

Huston, sophomore in pre-business, said that since the accident, she was paranoid to drive at night and doesn't like to talk about the accident.

Hines said the accident not only has changed her life in what she can and cannot do, but in the way she sees life in general.

"I am very grateful to be alive," she said. "I am also very overwhelmed by the love and friendships people have shown me."

Hines said she continues to make progress each day to get better.

"I crossed my first crosswalk the other day," Hines said.

"It was kind of scary, but I had a person on each side of me protecting me."

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Though student privilege fees won't increase for students next fall, the university will institute a tuition increase.

Full-time, undergraduate residents will see a 3.9-percent increase, resulting in a total of $68.05 tuition per credit hour. Non-resident undergraduate students will see a 2.7-percent increase, totaling $283 per credit hour.

These charges do not include campus privilege fees.

Part of the percentage increases will go toward a $1 per-credit-hour technology fee, which will be spent on instructional technology and equipment for the university.

Budget Director John Struve said when looking at needs for the university, an increase was apparent for instructional technology and equipment. He said the university had received about $400,000 from the state last year, but more funding was needed for growth.

"We felt that the best route to take was self-funding," Struve said.

The $1 per-credit-hour increase will be matched with $2 per credit hour from the state of Kansas. The 2-for-1 match has yet to be approved by Gov. Bill Graves, but Struve said he expects the governor to sign the bill.

All Kansas Board of Regents universities also will share a one-time, $5 million allocation from the state. K-State will receive just more than $1 million of that allocation, Struve said. This money is financially unrelated to tuition.

"The state is in good financial standing this year," Struve said.

The allocation money also will go toward funding instructional technology and equipment. Total revenue for the university from the 2-for-1 match and state allocation could total as much as $2.5 million.

The rest of the tuition increase will fund increased costs of the university, Struve said.

Struve said a tuition increase is common each year. He said the increase this year is in close range with last year's 4-percent increase for undergraduate residents.

Tuition increase since 1995-96

These are the undergraduate, per-credit-hour prices for tuition at K-State for the past three years and the rate for next year.

YEAR	RESIDENT	NON-RESIDENT
1997-98	$65.50	$275.65
1996-97	$63	$265
1995-96	$59	$249

Graves signs health insurance program into law; bill intended to help children

TOPEKA — Facing an audience of preschoolers at a day care center, Gov. Bill Graves signed into law Tuesday a bill that creates a new health insurance program for children.

The program is designed to cover 60,000 children whose parents do not have health insurance for them. Officials said they believed poor working families will benefit the most.

The governor had a bill-signing ceremony at the Topeka YWCA. Teachers brought in about 30 children, ages 4, 5 and 6, to watch. Two 5-year-olds stood on each side of Graves as he signed the bill, first with a pen, then with crayons.

The state expects to spend about $42 million on the new program during its 1999 fiscal year, which begins July 1. But about $30 million of the money is coming from the federal government, which wanted to encourage states to start such programs.

"This, I think, is one of the really smart things the federal government has done," Graves said.

Also attending the ceremony were Insurance Commissioner Kathleen Sebelius and Janet Schalansky, deputy secretary of social and rehabilitation services.

The bill sets up the program and imposes guidelines for its operations. Plans are to allow private companies and nonprofit organizations to bid on the right to private insurance coverage.

The bill takes effect upon its publication in the Kansas Register, probably next week. The register is the state's official publication.

Breast cancer drugs may prevent illness; women must weigh risky side effects

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Amid optimistic reports that two drugs might help prevent breast cancer, the government is struggling to help women decide who should start using the pills — or if the side effects are too risky.

For one of the drugs, the government had a stark message Tuesday: Despite headlines trumpeting raloxifene, Eli Lilly's new osteoporosis drug, there is no good evidence yet that the medicine truly wards off breast cancer.

But a National Cancer Institute study did find that a related medicine called tamoxifen cuts the chances of breast cancer by a significant 45 percent in certain women — and the NCI said Tuesday it is preparing kits to help doctors focus on just those women whose potential benefit from the pills would outweigh the side effects.

"The message very much is, each woman is different," said Dr. Richard Klausner, NCI's director. "There is no cut-and-dried formula" to say which woman needs the drug.

A 35-year-old woman whose mother and aunt both had breast cancer and who has undergone biopsies herself for early signs of the disease is a good tamoxifen candidate, said Dr. Norman Wolmark, the Pennsylvania doctor who led the tamoxifen study.

But tamoxifen can cause potentially life-threatening side effects, including uterine cancer and blood clots, and women older than 50 were particularly vulnerable, noted Cynthia Pearson of the National Women's Health Network.

Astronomers' findings support theories of life on planets outside solar system

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Signs of a new family of planets orbiting a distant star are the clearest evidence yet of worlds forming beyond our solar system and suggest that planets where life could evolve might exist throughout the universe, astronomers say.

Using powerful new instruments on telescopes in Hawaii and Chile, two teams of astronomers independently found a doughnut-shaped disk of dust rotating around a star 220 light-years away. A light-year is about 5.9 trillion miles.

They said at a news conference Tuesday that the hole in the doughnut might have been caused by the birth of planets.

"A solar system like our own is being constructed in the middle of this disk," said David Koerner of the University of Pennsylvania. He is a member of an astronomy team that used the Keck II telescope in Hawaii to study the star.

He said the finding, along with similar discoveries reported this week in the journal Nature, suggests that planets might be common throughout the universe.

GENEVA — The United States on Tuesday failed for the first time since 1991 to persuade the U.N. Human Rights Commission to condemn Cuba for rights violations.

The Geneva-based watchdog group denounced widespread terror in Iraq and grave violations of human rights in Nigeria and Sudan, but spared Cuba by a vote of 19-16. The commission also agreed to condemn a litany of rights abuses in Myanmar, also known as Burma.

The leader of the Cuban delegation, Carlos Amat Flores, said countries had recognized a series of signals that Cuba is opening up, including Pope John Paul II's visit to the Caribbean island in January.

In Washington, D.C., the State Department said it was disappointed deeply by the vote.

"Some members of the U.N. Human Rights Commission ... have chosen to turn their backs on the suffering of the Cuban people," spokesman James P. Rubin said. "The United States will redouble efforts to promote freedom in Cuba."

Some 18 countries abstained on the Cuban motion, which would have renewed the mandate to continue investigating Cuba for human rights violations for another year.

The voting came as the 53-member commission was finishing its six-week annual session. Some votes pitted Europe and the United States against Africa and Asia.

On Iraq, 32 nations voted to condemn "all-pervasive repression and oppression sustained by broad-based discrimination and widespread terror." The rest abstained.

Iraqi representative Mohammed Salman said it seemed his country was before "more ... a political commission than a commission on human rights."

A motion deploring Israeli abuses in occupied southern Lebanon was approved, with every country except the United States voting in favor.

Regarding the Cuba vote, special investigator Carl-Johan Groth, in a report to the panel last month, lamented continuing human rights abuses in Cuba. But he also placed blame on the United States, saying its long-running embargo "contributes to the rigidity of the system currently in place."

In Cuba, leading human rights activist Elizardo Sanchez said he believed the vote showed "a certain tiredness" by the commission about the Cuba issue.

He said the human rights situation in Cuba "continues to be very unfavorable," though the government gradually has been reducing the number of political prisoners it keeps.

His Cuban Commission of Human Rights and National Reconciliation now counts 300 to 350 political prisoners in Cuba, down sharply from about 1,000 at the start of 1997.

MICHELLE LYNCH, PROGRAM DIRECTOR OF HOME OWNERS MAINTENANCE AND ENERGY PROGRAM, PUTS PRIMER ON THE SIDE OF A HOUSE TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

Students spend week volunteering

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

Volunteers worked on painting the outside of a home on Bertrand Street as part of Community Service Week.

The project was sponsored by K-State's Community Service Program and the Home Owners Maintenance and Energy Program.

Michelle Lynch, program director of the HOME Program, said HOME deals mainly with heavy household chores, basic repairs, yard care and running errands for low-income, elderly and disabled home owners.

The house the volunteers worked on Tuesday is owned by a single working mother.

The chipping and peeling paint on the wood siding of the house was starting to cause rotting and deterioration, Lynch said. The job is very labor-intensive. Lynch said HOME volunteers began stripping the paint at the beginning of the month. She said she hopes to have the project completed by the middle of May.

▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board calls for more students to get involved in community service. See Page 4.

"This is one of the bigger projects we do throughout the year, and it takes a lot of volunteers to get it done," Lynch said.

Austin Bell, sophomore in radio and television, said he heard about the project through a former volunteer and decided to help.

"Helping people out is where it's at. It's good to get out and help people who don't have the time or resources to do it themselves," Bell said. "I have the time."

Students wanting to get involved should call Jim Theres at 532-6868.

Bell said he did not volunteer for personal benefit, but because the house's inhabitants and its neighbors will appreciate the improvements.

Bell said someday he will be able to drive by the house and know it looks good because of his help.

Lynch said the turnout for the project was lower than she expected. She said she thought there would be four or five student volunteers. Instead, there was only one.

Jim Theres, public relations director for the Community Service Program, said the turnout for Community Service Week should increase as the week goes on.

Theres said it is hard to find volunteers this close to finals.

On Wednesday, students will work with the children's garden club at Lee School.

Theres said the women's basketball team also will be there.

The Community Service Program will sponsor a visit to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Thursday and the Sunset Zoological Park all day Friday.

▶ LINKS, NEW APPEARANCE DRAWS POSITIVE FEEDBACK FROM USERS.

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's new World Wide Web page went up early the morning of March 31 and has received positive feedback since then.

"The response has been positive and more frequent than I would have expected," Ken Conrow, associate director of Computing and Network Services, said.

Janelle Esau, computer information specialist, said she thinks the biggest improvement to the new page is the addition of expanded categories.

Having more than just the category links and being able to link directly to different campus offices allows people to find what they are looking for immediately, Esau said.

Other additions include the appearance of the K-State white pages and the search engine directly on the home page.

"It was one of the most highly used features, and it's now available right off the home page," Esau said.

The feedback received from users has been mostly positive.

"A lot of times you put something new up and wait for the earth to fall," Esau said. "People have been pleased with the new appearance. They've been pleased to find a lot of things quickly. It's been more user-friendly."

Clay Rush, sophomore in computer science, said he liked the fact that the new home page has links to everything.

"It's not a real big difference, but I like it," Rush said. "Everything is just really easy to get to."

The few complaints relate to users accustomed to quickly clicking on a link being unable to find things, Esau said.

She said there is a transition guide along the bottom of the page that usually can help those who are lost.

CNS encourages comments, Esau said.

"If someone is looking for something and they can't find it, we would like to know."

There are a few more changes to be implemented, Esau said.

Esau said CNS will continue to add to the secondary pages. Also, the photograph of Anderson Hall will be rotated with other photographs. The upper left corner of the page will be used more often as links to sites for current campus events.

Students should spend more time volunteering

Sometimes it seems like a broken record.

But student turnout at Tuesday's home project for Community Service Week proved just how ineffective the message is. Only one student volunteer showed up to help paint the outside of a home on Bertrand Street.

Jim Theres, public relations director for the Community Service Program, said part of the reason for the lack of volunteers was that Community Service Week falls so close to finals. He also said the turnout should increase as the week goes on and more projects are undertaken.

▶ More info? Anyone who wants more information about Community Service Week should call 532-6868.

It would be terrible to disappoint such high hopes.

Community Service Week is an opportunity for all K-State students to get involved. Traditionally, the only volunteers who get deserved recognition are those who work through sororities, fraternities, Golden Key National Honor Society, Blue Key and other organizations. This time, however, all students can participate. This time, all students get recognized.

Today from 3:30 to 4:30 p.m. students can volunteer at Lee School, helping with a garden projec. Thursday from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., volunteers can help out at Manhattan Emergency Shelter. Friday wraps up Community Service Week with projects all day at Sunset Zoological Park, including a small recognition ceremony from 3 to 4 p.m.

But people shouldn't limit themselves to volunteering only during special weeks. And they should take part in community service not just because they belong to organizations that require it.

The true meaning of volunteering is to help others out without expecting rewards.

By looking at the turnout so far this week, students have quite a way to go.

EARTH DAY 1998

Acting responsibly leads Earth safely into future

VIEWPOINT

STACY MEREDITH
Stacy is a junior in geography. You can send e-mail to Stacy at slm4798@ksu.edu.

For many people the term environmentalism stirs up images of tree-hugging fanatics chained to oil rigs, chanting "Save the whales." In reality, the principle environmentalism is based on is that people need to take responsibility for their actions in order to protect the earth for future generations.

Earth Day is a time to raise awareness around the world of existing environmental problems and to enable each person to become a better steward of the earth. It is not a day to disagree on government regulations or debate the existence of certain controversial environmental problems. Instead, it is a day when each of us can become aware of the environmental problems around us and begin to take part in simple solutions.

It is impossible to deny that many environmental problems exist, because they are very visible and affect many people. Looking around Kansas we can see polluted and depleted streams, rivers and ground water. When we fly into many urban centers, we can see the layers of pollution surrounding the city. Globally, skin cancer rates in the Southern Hemisphere have skyrocketed, and the children cannot even play outside without sunscreen and long sleeves.

On a positive note, the vast majority of environmental problems were caused by humans, which means we as humans can solve them. Many solutions to these problems are everyday, cost-effective activities. Here are five simple things each of us can do, while saving money in the process.

1. RECYCLE. Almost everything can be recycled these days, such as paper, plastic, glass and batteries. By recycling we reduce the amount of resources that need to be used and open up new markets for recycled goods.

2. CONSERVE WATER. With increasing populations, issues of water quality and quantity will continue to increase also. Actions such as taking quick showers instead of baths, turning off the water while brushing our teeth, and making sure there are no leaks in faucets are simple things each of us can do to make a big difference.

3. CAR POOL AND WALK. This does not mean we can't drive cars at all. It simply means to use common sense. If four people are going to the same place, it would make sense for one person to drive rather than have them ride in four separate cars.

4. CONSERVE ELECTRICITY. In this age of technology the demands for electricity are increasing every day. Simple things such as using energy-conserving light bulbs, turning off lights when leaving a room, and properly insulating homes all help to reduce the demand for energy.

5. GET INVOLVED. There are several campus and community groups that focus on taking care of the environment. You do not need to belong to a group to get involved in protecting the environment.

Simply by doing the steps above, you will be taking an active role and will make a difference.

Earth Day is all about the future. What we do now will determine what the conditions will be for our children and grandchildren. Do we really want to leave them a polluted and depleted planet?

So take a moment today to think about what you want for the future, and start or continue to take part in simple activities that will make a difference. Your children and grandchildren will thank you for it.

What are you doing for our world? That's the question I've been asking myself lately. The thought entered my head after yet another weekend of mindless partying and subsequent recovery. I was laying on the couch on Sunday evening, half asleep, half awake, when "From the Earth to the Moon" came on. This multiple-part miniseries chronicles the space program's success, from the Soviet launch of Sputnik to America's manned flights to the moon.

Luckily, I caught the episode about Apollo 11 and the first men ever to land and walk on the moon. It was incredible to watch the mission that forever changed humans' perceptions of our world and our galaxy. The men from Apollo 11 can be labeled as three of humanity's greatest contributors, because they laid the groundwork for our integration into space. They obviously did a lot for our world.

So what are you doing for it?

I'm not implying that everyone needs to become an astronaut or search for untraveled lands. That's asking too much. But I am saying that everyone needs to start making a contribution to this big, swirling ball of water and land. Now before anyone thinks I'm preaching, let me tell you what I do for our world.

Nothing. That's the problem.

There are too many like me, who would rather somebody else shoulder the responsibility of making our world a better place to live.

So what do we do about it? We get off our butts and do something productive. By productive, I mean something that will make a positive contribution toward humanity or humanity's playground — Earth.

"Well, what could I possibly do?" some might ask. "Anything you feel that's right," I say. There's hundreds of little things everyone can do to make this place a little more tolerable, things people are doing right now while most of us are watching television.

Here's a short list of just a few of the little things we can all do to help ourselves and one another:

1. Donate blood or plasma.
2. Recycle glass, paper or plastics.
3. Be a big brother or sister for a youth in Manhattan.
4. Pick up trash on the street when you see it just lying there.
5. Give a little food to any organization that needs it.
6. Give old clothes to a thrift shop without expecting money
7. Stop littering.
8. Give spare change to charity organizations.
9. Buy recycled products.
10. Give any extra time, money or belongings to people or causes that need it.

Granted, it's a very short list, but any of us can do one or all of these things. You don't have to be Lewis and Clark, Mother Theresa or an Apollo astronaut to contribute to humanity. All you have to do is care. Actually, I take that back. All you have to do is care enough to do something. It doesn't take much to make a difference.

If we can all do our part to help, this world will be improved tenfold. What can be a more noble cause than making Earth a better place to live? I can't think of anything. After all, this place is our home, and until the days of planetary colonization comes it will continue to be our home. So let's do some spring cleaning, some renovation, some reconstruction to our big spherical mansion.

As Neil Armstrong put it, man's first step on the moon was, "One small step for man, and one giant leap for mankind." We need to keep humankind's feet underneath us so we can take even larger leaps. Sure, the big leaps are accomplished in monumental fashion, but it's the small steps leading up to the leap that makes it all possible. Let's all concentrate on those small steps.

As I said earlier, I really don't do anything to help make this place better, but I'm going to start. It was "From the Earth to the Moon" that got me thinking about it. I hope this column will spark that thought in others' heads.

So what am I going to do now?

I think I'll take all my old clothes out to Grandma's Trunk and while I'm on my way, I'll put my cigarette out in the ashtray instead of tossing it out the window. Hey, it's that easy.

Reliance on past, present architectural values belittles possibilities for future

In campus architectural circles, the theme that seems to resurface continually in any discussion is that of the historicist nature of K-State's buildings.

For example, a conversation overheard the other day in the K-State Student Union:

Laura Lee: Them buildings pretty.

Zeke: You think me and you can ever find to afford to get us here a house like that there president's house?

Laura Lee: Oh, Zeke, that house is too historicist for us. I want something more modern and stuff.

Anyway, we use the term historicist, meaning evocative of past architectural styles and construction, as a way of explaining why some architects would choose to design a building in the late 20th century that includes Gothic windows and arches slightly reminiscent of a castle.

This is an issue that is quite immediate this school year, especially with the opening of the traditionalist Hale Library last November. And it's an issue integral to most of the columns I've written about the built environment on campus, be it the poor quality and maintenance of our existing historical buildings or recent construction that poorly imitates the past.

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Russell is a senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu.

All arguments being a relative generalization, not all campus construction works in this vein. How does one explain the bland corporate style of Throckmorton Hall? Perhaps as a sister to campus wunderkind Ackert Hall? Of course, the current ancien régime would never admit it is continuing the K-State tradition of extremely poor architectural standards.

This campus often confuses historicism with the picturesque or merely beautiful. A historicist structure isn't always necessarily a beautiful one, as it follows a modernist building isn't always ugly.

At K-State, we tend to have both bad historicist and modernist buildings, but for some reason the campus will accept a bad building as long as it has "normal" characteristics — pitched roof, wood moldings, limestone, arches. Besides, there is little evidence that the collegiate Gothic and Richardson romanesque architecture of a handful of campus buildings has ever proved its worth academically; it has surely never proved itself a regional architectural tradition.

So why latch onto a past that doesn't exist? Just when, pray tell, will K-State begin to recognize the significant contributions of this century's architects?

A good argument against historicist buildings was stated simply in 1991 by Los Angeles architect Frank Gehry when he said, "I'll tell you why I find them offensive. It's that you and I have kids. You want to tell your kids that there is a future, there is a life. I would be embarrassed to tell my kids that I don't know how to deal with the present, and that the only way I can deal with life is to copy something from the past.

"That would be like telling my kids there is no present and there may not be a future. Now that all may be right, but there certainly is a present. I don't know about the future, but to go back is like selling your kids down the river."

For example, in our pursuit of keeping limestone the de rigeur material of campus construction, we have marginalized the use of other materials and construction types. While our architectural styles have changed, most of what occurs within those buildings has stayed the same, albeit reduced to cheaper, less sensitive materials. There is a shocking lack of glass in K-State buildings, Durland Hall's flash cube aside. And even Durland is less defined inside by the glass that seems so apparent outside.

With all of the heavy limestone throughout campus, a non-mirrored glass building or at least one that relies on some glass curtain walls would be an interesting contrast.

Although it is the rare commentator who would suggest a shocking, almost radical work of architecture be built on campus, it seems logical that the only way to rock the established view of the contemporary condition out of its atrophy is to build progressively in at least one project. And though advocating a "name" architect from out of state seems a bit wrong-headed, especially considering the burn of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, perhaps it's time.

Giving up some control, allowing a foreign mind to intrude our narrow way of looking at what our campus could be, might just prove the sort of thing this campus needs to break from cultural stasis.

Reader gives thanks to drive volunteers

Editor,

On behalf of the KSU Alumni Association and the family of Mike Meier, I would like to thank all of the students, faculty and community members who participated in the Mike Meier Bone Marrow Donor Drive on April 14 and 15.

The drive added nearly 200 individuals to the Heart of America Bone Marrow Donor Registry. Only 30 percent of those who need a marrow transplant will find a matched donor within their families. The rest must search for an unrelated donor through this national registry.

Every name added increases the chances for thousands of children and adults who are in need of a matching bone marrow donor. Thanks to all those who joined this effort to save lives by making themselves available as donors.

In addition, we had 77 student volunteers work at the drive and more than 150 assist with the drive in some capacity. One of the best things to come out of this drive was the cooperation of such a wide array of student organizations. Where else on campus will you see academic clubs, social clubs and service clubs all working hand in hand to accomplish a single goal?

Organizations that participated in the planning and coordination of the drive included the following: Ag REPS/Ag Ambassadors, Ag Student Council, Alpha Kappa Alpha, Alpha Phi Omega, Alpha Xi Delta, Collegiate Agri-Women, Hospitality Management Society, KSSSLHA, Arts and Sciences Ambassadors, Pi Beta Phi, Delta Sigma Theta Sorority Inc., Gamma Phi Beta, Smith Scholarship House, Society of Women Engineers and Student Alumni Board.

I know this is a busy time of year on a college campus, and it is commendable that so many students were still able to find time to donate to this worthy cause. But the real thanks goes to those who made the life commitment to be part of the Heart of America Bone Marrow Donor Registry. If you missed the drive but would like more information about becoming a potential donor, call the KSU Alumni Association at 532-6260.

Alumni back decision to suspend fraternity

Editor,

Both my wife and I are proud alumni, class of 1976, and are preparing to send our son to K-State next fall. We were shocked to hear of the incident surrounding the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity hazing incident, which made the 10 p.m. TV news in Wichita, especially coming so soon after the K-State Open House weekend we recently attended where we were assured, multiple times, that hazing did not take place.

I applaud the decision of the dean of student life to suspend the fraternity until the facts can be ascertained. If the allegations are true, K-State should make the suspension permanent to send a clear, strong message to all fraternities and sororities that the K-State administration will take strong, swift action against those who disregard the policies of the university on hazing.

Poor lighting places pedestrians at risk

Editor,

I am a K-State student concerned with the safety of pedestrians, bicyclists and drivers along North Manhattan Avenue. I have noticed in my two years here at K-State that this street is very dangerous to travel. The lighting is very dim, which makes it very hard to see pedestrians and bicyclists crossing the street. Overhanging trees makes locating street signs very difficult.

I feel that resurfacing North Manhattan Avenue needs to be done as soon as possible. Once the street is resurfaced, the street can then be remarked. When the street is remarked, the Bicycle Master Plan should be implemented. I have been told that the street is going to get resurfaced in the next couple years, but this is too long to wait.

The lighting on North Manhattan Avenue is insufficient for everyone who travels on this street. The lights are not top-of-the-line, and the city needs to have KPL Gas Service install better lights.

The City of Manhattan needs to realize people's lives are at stake. There are several accidents a year on North Manhattan Avenue, and by installing new lights, this might cut back on the accidents.

I also have noticed that sometimes at night the street lights are not operating. I have been told that the reason for this is because there is only one transformer feeding the lights. There are plans to add a second transformer to feed the lights. These plans need to be implemented right away. Money should not be an issue when you are dealing with human lives.

By implementing the Bicycle Master Plan, cutting and trimming trees, and adding a second transformer to feed the street lights, this will remedy the situation.

This is a significant concern for many students here at K-State, and I for one would like something done right away.

NEW YORK — Pitcher Randy Johnson of the Seattle Mariners was suspended for three games by American League president Gene Budig Tuesday for throwing at Kenny Lofton of the Cleveland Indians in a game Wednesday.

The suspension is effective beginning Friday, meaning unless he appeals the punishment, Johnson would miss his next scheduled start on Saturday against Minnesota.

Johnson threw at Lofton after being warned by the umpires about a previous close pitch in the game. Each time, players from both teams stormed out of their dugouts and some engaged in shoving matches.

Johnson, Lofton and Sandy Alomar of the Indians were ejected.

American League spokeswoman Phyllis Merhige said Tuesday that other players had been disciplined in addition to Johnson, but she would not say which ones. The league normally announces only suspensions and does not make fines public.

White changes mind, intends to play for Packers in 1998

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Just two days after he announced his retirement, Reggie White has changed his mind and said he intends to play for the Green Bay Packers next season.

"I have re-evaluated my decision," White said in a statement released by the Packers on Tuesday. "I decided I would not retire and that I would play one more year."

On Sunday, the 36-year-old defensive end said he was retiring because of a bad back. He had planned a farewell news conference in Green Bay today.

The NFL's all-time leading sacker, nicknamed the minister of defense, said he would explain why he changed his mind at the news conference, which is still planned as scheduled.

White had 11 sacks last year, giving him 176 1/2 for his 13-year career. He was selected to the Pro Bowl for a record 12th consecutive time despite an ailing back that limited him to part-time duty, and a case of walking pneumonia the last month of the season.

White helped lead the Packers to two consecutive Super Bowl appearances, including the team's 35-21 victory over New England in 1997. The team lost this year to the Denver Broncos.

A member of the NFL's 75th anniversary all-star team, he joined the Packers in 1993 for four years and $17 million after eight seasons with the Philadelphia Eagles as the first big-name free agent to switch teams.

White recently was criticized for a speech to Wisconsin lawmakers in which he spoke in racial stereotypes and assailed gay lifestyle.

White is an ordained clergyman affiliated with a Baptist church in Knoxville, Tenn. Citing Scripture, White told the Wisconsin Assembly that one of the biggest sins is homosexuality, and the Bible speaks against it.

White, who is black, also told the largely white audience that blacks, whites, Hispanics, Japanese, Asians and Indians have different "gifts."

White said his racial comments were meant to point out the positive traits of different groups.

Royals backup catcher forced to miss as many as 6 weeks for pulling muscle in rib cage

SEATTLE — The Kansas City Royals were down to one catcher Tuesday after backup Sal Fasano pulled a muscle in his rib cage during batting practice the day before.

Fasano could miss at two weeks or maybe as many as six weeks, trainer Nick Swartz said.

The Royals were expected to call up a catcher from their Class AAA team at Omaha or their Class AA team at Wichita.

Fasano was made the backup to Mike Sweeney when the Royals traded Mike Macfarlane to Oakland two weeks ago.

Macfarlane was traded for Shane Mack because the Royals needed outfield help, and because Muser wanted to give Fasano a chance.

"It just felt like somebody stabbed me in the back," Fasano said.

Swartz said it was difficult to say how much time Fasano would miss.

"If it's a mild strain, we're looking at seven to 10 days or two weeks," Swartz said. "If it's more serious, it could be two, four, up to six weeks."

Utility player Shane Halter was the backup for Sweeney on Monday, but he has never caught in a professional game.

K-STATE CENTER FIELDER KASEY WEISHAAR DIVES FOR THE BALL DURING A BASEBALL GAME AGAINST NO. 12 BAYLOR UNIVERSITY ON TUESDAY AFTERNOON AT FRANK MYERS FIELD. THE TWO TEAMS SPLIT THE DOUBLEHEADER.

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State baseball team needed this.

A spirited win against not only one of the better teams in the conference, but also the No. 12 team in the country.

The Cats beat Baylor 4-2 in the first game of a doubleheader on Tuesday and increased their chances for a postseason berth. Baylor clipped the Cats 10-2 in the nightcap.

"We put ourselves in a position to win a ballgame," head coach Mike Clark said of the first game. "Their pitcher made a mistake in the ninth inning, and we won the ballgame. We hung in there in the second, but they were just better in that game."

In the first of the twin bill, the Cats scored a run in the first and a run in the second to tie the score at two apiece in the second inning.

No one scored again until the eighth inning. Second baseman Chad Tabor led the inning off with a walk and advanced to second on catcher Yancy Ayres' sacrifice bunt to the third baseman. With two outs, right fielder Quinn Cravens, who had struck out in three previous times at the plate, hit a two-run shot to right field and put the Cats up 4-2. Baylor grounded out in four at-bats in the top of the ninth and couldn't muster a comeback.

It was Craven's seventh homer of the season and second game-winning RBI in the past five games.

"I had struck out three times," Cravens said. "I just wanted to put something in play. I sat on it and drove it, and it carried to right."

Game one featured a pitcher's duel. Baylor ace Jason Jennings kept K-State at bay striking seven along the way. Meanwhile, K-State skipper Brandon Peck pitched some of his best ball of the year. Peck went 7 1/3 innings, giving up just five hits and two earned runs while striking out seven along the way. Relief pitcher Andy Silva pitched an inning and a half of shutout ball and picked up the win, pushing his record to 3-1 on the year. Meanwhile, Jennings' record fell to 9-2.

Center fielder Eric Sommerhauser made his first appearance since the Fort Hays State game on April 14. Sommerhauser sustained an ankle injury before the Bethany game on April 15 after he stepped on a baseball during warmups. It first was assumed that he broke his ankle, but further tests revealed it was just a sprain. Sommerhauser went 2-4 with a triple and an RBI.

Again the Cats ran into some tough pitching in the second game. Starter Josh Scott put a halt on K-State offense. Scott allowed just two hits and one run, which came in the first, in seven innings of play. The Cats couldn't muster any offense against Scott, who increased his record to 3-0 with the win.

"He didn't let us off the mat," Clark said. "We couldn't get anything going offensively after the second inning, and we didn't get many good looks at the plate."

In his sixth appearance on the year, K-State starter Mickey Blount also threw some of his best ball on the year. Blount struck out a career-high 12 batters in seven innings of play.

The Cats had just two runs, one coming in the first and the other in the ninth.

K-State dropped to 6-12 in the Big 12 Conference, which puts it in a tie for 10th place with Texas. Baylor (34-13, 16-8) moved into a tie for first place with Texas A&M.

Game three of the series concludes at 2 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field. Chris Traylor (1-4) will make his 10th appearance of the year as the Cats try to take the series from Baylor.

K-State women swat Nebraska in final match of season

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

Despite struggling at the top of the lineup, the K-State tennis team managed to beat the Nebraska Cornhuskers on Saturday in Lincoln, Neb., to close out the regular season.

The win was the Wildcats' fourth in a row, giving them a 10-10 record on the year. It also provided the team with a 6-5 Big 12 record. These are vast improvements for a team that finished 7-14 (2-9 in conference) last season.

However, the star all season for the Cats did not come through in the final meet of the season.

Yana Dorodnova has led the team with her play at No. 1 singles all season, but she lost to Nebraska's Sandra Noetzel in straight sets, 7-5, 6-3.

"Yana didn't play her best tennis today," K-State coach Steve Bietau said.

But, another senior did rise to the occasion for her final regular season meet as a Cat. Dinah Watson won both her singles and doubles matches. She was the only Cat to accomplish this feat.

"Dinah did a good job," Bietau said. "She really kept in control."

In winning 5-4, the Cats lost both the singles and doubles at Nos. 1 and 2. However, they won every match at No. 3 and below.

At No. 3 singles, Martina Pospisilova continued to roll since joining the team in early March. She straight-setted Jennifer Thoste of Nebraska 6-3, 6-4.

"Martina played awfully well in her singles," Bietau said.

The win was important for the Cats in seedings for the upcoming Big 12 and Regional tournaments.

However, Bietau was concerned when the Cats struggled in doubles after opening up a 4-2 lead in singles for the second straight match.

"I'm happy with our play in singles," Bietau said. "The importance of this match is for our confidence level."

The Cats next play will be in the Big 12 Tournament, which begins Thursday in Lincoln.

Netters earn academic honors

Two K-State tennis players, seniors Yana Dorodnova and Lena Piliptchak, were named to the First Team Academic All-Big 12 Team on Tuesday.

This is the second-consecutive year Dorodnova has been named to the team. Dorodnova plays at the No. 1 spot in the singles draw and is 14-5 overall this season, 6-3 in Big 12 play.

Piliptchak has been named to the team three years in a row, including the former Big 8 academic team. She plays at No. 5 singles and is 11-8 overall, 7-3 in the Big 12.

To be named to the All-Big 12 Team, nominees must maintain a 3.0 grade point average and participate in 50 percent of the matches played. To be named to the first team, the nominees must maintain a 3.2 GPA.

It's time for the greatest event in all of sports.

Better than the Super Bowl. Better than March Madness. Better than the World Series. Better than K-State football's 1998 season opener vs. the Sycamores of Indiana State.

It's time for the NBA playoffs. In other words, it's showtime.

VIEWPOINT

BYRON VOGEL

Byron is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Byron at byronv@ksu.edu.

But before we delve into the intricate sea of playoff prophecy, let us keep in step with the NBA's brilliant practice of handing out the postseason hardware before the season even concludes.

First team all-NBA: Michael Jordan, Gary Payton, Shaquille O'Neal, Karl Malone and Tim Duncan. Yes, Tim Duncan. The Spurs' first-year phenom matched fellow twin tower David Robinson in almost every statistical category. He led all NBA rookies with 21.1 points, 11.9 rebounds and 2.5 blocked shots per game. Moreover, when Robinson was hospitalized by Malone's wayward elbow two weeks ago, Duncan dominated in Robinson's stead.

Most Valuable Player: Jordan. His paltry average of 28.7 points per game still was sufficient to capture the league scoring title — again.

Coach of the Year: Larry Bird. The man from Indiana defied all logic and exceeded all expectations by leading the Pacers to a 58-24 record, easily their winningest season in franchise history.

Rookie of the Year: Duncan. Duh.

Defensive Player of the Year: Dikembe Mutombo. With 3.4 blocked shots per game, Mutombo is the only player in the NBA who can say "Not in my house" in five different languages. And for the record, the man's full name is Dikembe Mutombo Mplondo Mukamba Jean Jacque Wamutombo.

Sixth Man of the the Year: Kobe Bryant. Sure, he won't turn 20 until Aug. 23, but he came off the Laker bench to the tune of 15.4 points per game.

Comeback Player of the Year: Robinson. He played only six games last season, and the Spurs lost 62 games. This year, he played in 73 contests and helped engineer a 36-win differential, the biggest turnaround in NBA history. Only O'Neal stands in Robinson's way of a first-team All-NBA selection.

Most Improved Player: Alan Henderson. After putting up 6.4 points per game in his first two seasons with the Hawks, Hendu lit it up for 14.3 points per game in 1997-98.

Most Overrated Player: Joe Smith. The No. 1 overall pick in the 1995 NBA Draft, Smith's game looks more and more like Danny Ferry's every day. That is, without the three-point shot.

Now from the glorious individual honors to the gloryless team accomplishments (see: Los Angeles Lakers).

The Jazz, Supersonics and Lakers stand well above their Western Conference foes, but in the NBA, home-court advantage is the name of the game. All three will coast to the second round, where Seattle's experience will punch holes in L.A.'s youthful me-first facade.

Utah, which lost in six games to the Bulls in last year's finals, will lose no more than two games en route to the conference finals. After that, expect the Jazz to prevail in a tight seven-game series vs. Seattle, whose league-worst rebounding woes will spell certain doom.

In the east, Chicago has played through more turmoil this season than ever before. In the past month alone, Jordan implied that Bulls owner Jerry Reinsdorf should sell the team, then Scottie Pippen told Reinsdorf to "go to hell" upon hearing he would be offered a one-year contract extension at season's end. Nevertheless, look for the Bulls to sleepwalk to the east finals with nary a loss.

Miami has the No. 2 seed in round one by virtue of its Atlantic Division championship. However, the Heat would lose home-court advantage in the second round to the Pacers, who have a better overall record. Indiana is capable of dispensing with Miami in five games, but it is not capable of beating the Bulls in a seven-game series. Look for Chicago to bounce Indiana in six games.

The "advantage" portion of Utah's home-court advantage stops at the turnstiles of the NBA Finals. During its five championship series since 1991, Chicago is 9-6 on the road. This record includes three straight against Magic Johnson's Lakers in 1991 and two straight in Phoenix in 1993, when the Suns had the home-court advantage only to lose the finals in six games.

With the finals' current 2-3-2 format, the Bulls need to win only one of the first two games in Utah before they sweep the next three games at home. Bulls in five.

Savor it, hoops fans, because once the victory cigars burn out, so will an era. Jordan and Coach Phil Jackson will retire, Pippen and Dennis Rodman will leave to play elsewhere, the Bulls will go the way of the Florida Marlins and the NBA will go the way of Big 12 basketball.

It's showtime for the last time in a long time.

Fraternity members upset by hazing

with this alleged hazing incident, despite IFC's strict rules against such rituals.

"People hear the word 'fraternity' and they automatically think it's one of the 24 fraternities controlled by IFC. But Kappa Alpha Psi is not a part of IFC," Keenan said.

Because Kappa Alpha Psi is not a member of IFC, Keenan said IFC has no control of punishment of the chapter. Pat Bosco, dean of student life, did suspend the chapter for violation of the Student Conduct Code.

Barb Robel, adviser of Greek Affairs, said her office would have taken similar action in the event of hazing from one of the fraternities in IFC's control.

Robel also said she has noticed a tendency for people to automatically assume Kappa Alpha Psi is a member of the IFC.

"We've had phone calls from parents whose sons are planning to pledge fraternities, and they want assurances that this kind of thing doesn't happen," Robel said.

Because of preconceived notions about fraternities, Jonathan Bruntz, the overseer of rituals for Pi Kappa Phi, said he thinks fraternities as a whole will automatically be blamed for the incident.

"It makes the whole greek system look bad," Bruntz said.

But Bruntz said K-State fraternities do not practice hazing today.

"Nothing like that goes on around here, hasn't for years, and never will again," Bruntz said.

"It hasn't happened for decades, and it's something that I'm personally ashamed of from our history."

Keenan supported Bruntz's assertion, saying the IFC has had rules forbidding hazing for many years.

"We have a strict anti-hazing policy in place and have since 1957," Keenan said.

Despite this policy, both Bruntz and Keenan said they feared that members of the IFC will feel repercussions for some time.

"The mass of people are hearing about a hazing," Bruntz said. "They're not hearing about all of the various aspects, such as this wasn't a member of the IFC and that this was an isolated incident."

Keenan said he feared this negative public perception would have long-term negative effects on fraternities around the campus.

"I think it's going to increase the number of questions that prospective members ask about hazing. I also think that in the long run it will reduce the number of students who decide to affiliate with fraternities," Keenan said.

Keenan said he hoped people would keep an open mind, and not automatically assume all fraternities practice such rituals.

"We hope people ask us questions," Keenan said.

"We will explain to them that we do not tolerate any hazing and have a swift judicial system to punish those who practice it."

Step taken to change Open Meetings Act

provisions of a Kansas law that sets quorums for many cities and limits the discussion of city business between commissioners outside a public forum.

The charter ordinance would change the quorum number to four, allowing just two commissioners to speak about business outside the public eye. It also would mean that more commissioners would have to attend a commission meeting before official business could take place.

There are necessary steps before the ordinance is enacted, however.

The ordinance will be published twice in The Manhattan Mercury and then there will be a 61-day waiting period when citizens can object to the ordinance.

By the request of the commission, a referendum also will have to be passed before the ordinance goes into effect, and the quorum can be switched back to three at any time with another ordinance.

Now, the quorum of the commission is three people. The Open Meetings Act stipulates that a meeting of a majority of a quorum cannot take place outside of a public forum and constitutes an actual commission meeting. As it stands, discussion between two Manhattan City Commissioners about business, no matter where the meeting takes place, is illegal.

Commissioner Roger Reitz said he opposed the ordinance during the first reading because the public might think the commission would betray its trust, but he has since changed his mind.

"Since the last meeting I haven't heard any negatives about the ordinance," Reitz said, "so I'll support it."

Mayor Steve Hall said that he agreed.

"I haven't heard any objections either," he said. "If there are any we will find out during the objection period."

Commissioners appoint new mayor of Manhattan

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

It's official — Steve Hall is the new mayor of Manhattan.

While family and friends looked on Tuesday evening, former mayor and now City Commissioner Bruce Snead passed mayoral duties on to Hall, reviewed the accomplishments of the commission during the past year and expressed his vision for the future.

"I want to do what I can do to keep Manhattan on track to being a more sustainable community," Snead told the audience of about 40 people.

Hall, who has been a city commissioner in Manhattan for five years, said Snead has been a role model for the community. Hall also said he looks forward to serving citizens.

"People ask me what the highlight has been over the five years," Hall said. "The contact I've had with different people and groups has been the highlight. Manhattan has some outstanding people, and I've had a chance to work with many of them."

In his first comments as mayor, Hall also outlined goals for the city. First among them is street repairs.

In the past, Hall said, the city spent an average of between $250,000 and $300,000 on repairs. That amount will jump to about $800,000 in 1998, Hall said, and $900,000 in 1999.

The half-cent city-sales tax affecting Manhattan consumers is another priority. It will end on Dec. 1, and Hall said a task force will be formed to determine if the sales tax should continue, what alternatives to the tax for gaining revenue are available and figuring out ways to manage the funds after the tax is over.

"We have to find out what amount people are willing to pay for different services in the community," Hall said.

Local bars hurt by underage drinking

military IDs and out-of-state drivers' licenses."

Boller said minors also borrow friends' IDs, but regardless of how they do it, minors routinely get through the door.

"A lot of it is fake IDs, using a friend's ID that they may look similar in appearance to," he said, "and sometimes they just get in through the crowd at the door."

Sometimes bar employees at the door don't pay attention, Tina Seina, junior in elementary education, said. Months after Seina turned 21 she went to KJ's, and three girls who were not 21 used her ID to enter, she said. The ID was from Nebraska, making it even more conspicuous, Seina said.

Seina said she'd used her ID at other bars before she was 21 without a problem.

"I don't think they know how to read a Nebraska license," she said. "I think they need more training on how to read out-of-state IDs."

Mike Robinson, manager of 12th Street Pub, said it has a book that shows drivers' licenses from every state and examples of how they can be tampered with.

But when looking for a fake ID, Robinson said the picture might not always be the best indicator, especially for women who often change hair colors and lengths.

Fellows said KJ's cards every customer who enters the bar, but carding is often difficult with so many fake IDs around.

"The police officers, ABC agents, they've been doing it for 20 or 30 years," he said. "They're trained professionals. We're not. You'd think they'd offer some sort of course you can send your employees to. There's so many bar owners down here that I'm sure we'd all take advantage of it."

Another problem can be bouncers letting their friends into the bar — an offense for which Robinson has fired two employees.

"The doormen know that if they are caught doing that they are terminated," he said. "That does happen, and drinks are given away, too, but that's the nature of the business."

In the past year, 12th Street Pub has only been cited once for serving a minor, Robinson said.

"I think it's a problem for everybody," he said. "You can't ever be 100-percent safe. We've had some problems, but we've done a pretty good job."

Excessive MIP violations in a bar also can shape the establishment's reputation, Robinson said.

"I think as far as perception goes, some bars are perceived as younger, and some are perceived as older," he said. "It just leaves a huge cloud over the bar's head."

The older bar crowd often is more mature in its drinking habits than younger drinkers, Seina said.

"Now that I'm older, it's just annoying because they drink all they want until they get smashed off their butts," she said. "They don't know how to drink in moderation."

The easiest way for minors to get into a bar is by using a good fake ID on weekdays or knowing a bouncer or owner, said Jason Archer, junior in finance and bouncer at Lucky's.

"The owner of Lucky's has a pretty good policy," he said. "Every minor that we do let in on the weekdays has to have an approval by Bob (Leetch), and he'll say, 'I don't want to see you drinking.' If they break the rules, they have to leave."

Using the same courtesy rule, Archer said he's let friends into Lucky's.

"If there's maybe two of them, I'll usually let them in because I trust them not to do anything stupid," Archer said. "There's usually a standard rule that they don't walk around and drink.

"When I let them in, they respect that," he said, "and if they screw up, they know I'm not going to let them in again."

Things change on the weekends as Archer said he tells friends not to come to Lucky's.

"It gets so crowded that we can't look over them," he said. "I don't want any of them getting MIPs."

MIPs are a misdemeanor charge, and for minors caught with a fake ID, it's another misdemeanor charge. If their fake ID was obtained at the Department of Motor Vehicles, then it is a felony charge. Likewise, bars can be fined up to $1,000 and be shut down for one day for each MIP violation in their bar.

In addition to KJ's having its license suspended in May, ABC will have a hearing for KJ's in May to rule on seven more pending cases. Fellows said the fines and suspensions don't seem fair.

"Kids know they are supposed to be 21 to be at a bar just like they know they can't go to Wal-Mart and steal a VCR," Fellows said. "But if they steal a VCR, it's not Wal-Mart that gets fined."

Web addiction may afflict students

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

It's 2:30 a.m., and most students in Manhattan are asleep.

But not all of them. Some sit in the glow of a computer monitor, surfing the World Wide Web, playing online games, downloading files or chatting with people from all over the world. Some might not stop until it's time to go to class.

As the number of people using the Internet rises, so does the visibility of Internet addiction. A study conducted by Kimberly Young, assistant professor of psychology at the University of Pittsburgh in Branford, Pa., found 396 of 496 avid Internet users to be "Internet dependent." She dubbed the condition "Pathological Internet Use," and the disorder was recognized formally by the American Psychological Association late last year.

College students, especially, might be susceptible to Internet addiction, some experts said.

Ray Hightower, assistant dean and assistant professor of engineering, said he deals with five to six students each semester whose academics have suffered from excessive Internet use.

"Certain people are affected by it such that it's just next to impossible to get away from it," he said. "I can tell you this — it's addictive."

Hightower said he thought most students became addicted to the Internet through the World Wide Web, the graphical point-and-click portion of the Internet.

"The Web is just a maze of information which they spend a lot of time just reading and going through the various pages and documents," he said.

The symptoms of Internet addiction resemble symptoms of other addictions, Hightower said.

"They get so involved they'll skip classes, and they almost have the same symptoms as somebody on drugs — they don't care about anything, don't care about sleep, don't care about friends, don't care about classes," he said. "They become loners."

University Counseling Services said it hadn't dealt with the problem. Hightower wasn't surprised. Addicts don't want to admit their problems, he said, and will understate the time they spend on the Internet.

Students with their own computers might fall into addiction easily, he said.

"If it's in the room, it's just too handy," he said. "Nobody sees them, they just spend all their time with the computer in the room."

However, some students go online in the campus computer labs. Recreational Internet use is prohibited during the day but is allowed after midnight.

At 2:30 Tuesday morning, about 10 students were online in the computer lab in Dickens Hall. A few were surfing the Web, but most were on Internet Relay Chat, or IRC, a worldwide network where people chat in real time.

Chris Nichols, sophomore in psychology, and Alana Franco, senior in family studies and human services, sat next to each other on separate computers, chatting in an online "room" with people from various locations in Kansas.

Both Nichols and Franco called themselves Internet addicts and said they chat on IRC every night. Nichols said he also plays online games, surfs the Web and swaps files.

"If you burn up like, I don't know, more than 200 hours online a month, you're probably considered an addict," Nichols said.

Most of his friends are addicts as well, he said.

Nichols said he didn't think spending time on IRC had adversely affected his grades, but he said IRC is known among users for being time-consuming.

"There's a neat little saying about IRC," he said. "Into Repeating Classes."

Franco said her time online increases when she is unhappy.

"The worse my life is, the more I spend on here, because I get attention and my friends are on here," she said.

Nichols said he has limited his online time successfully in the past. Others have been less successful.

"It's so bad I have had this student request that their parents, when they visited here, take the computer home with them," Hightower said.

Other students have used the Internet without it ever becoming a problem.

"The only time I use the Internet is for classes or research," Benton Carlson, senior in mechanical engineering, said. "I can believe that this could be a problem, though. It's something that you have to be able to control."

A study guide Hightower distributes to engineering students suggests studying away from housing to avoid distractions, one of which could be the Internet.

Nichols had his own advice for the hopelessly addicted.

"Yank the modem, that's the only thing I can tell you," he said. "Get a hobby."

How to tell if you're addicted to the Internet

"Internet Dependent," a condition dubbed by Kimberly Young, assistant professor of psychology at the University of Pittsburg in Bradford, Pen., was recognized officially as a disorder by the American Psychological Association (APA) last year. Here are a few signs that you may be Internet dependent:

Internet addict

1. Do you think about the Internet when offline?
2. Do you feel the need to use the Internet with increasing amounts of time in order to achieve satisfaction?
3. Have you repeatedly made unsuccessful efforts to control, cut back or stop Internet use?
4. Do you feel restless or irritable when attempting to cut down or stop Internet use?
5. Do you stay online longer than originally intended?
6. Have you jeopardized or risked the loss of a significant relationship, job, educational or career opportunity because of the Internet?
7. Have you lied to family members, friends or others to conceal the extent of involvement with the Internet?
8. Do you use the Internet to escape problems or improve your mood?

Those who answered "yes" to five or more questions were considered addicted.

Christian conference expresses faith in art forms

VIEWPOINT

JOSHUA STURGILL

Joshua is a junior in English. You can send e-mail to Joshua at sturj@ksu.edu.

As a Christian learning to express my faith through writing and drama, I found the recent "Creation and Creativity Conference" an excellent forum to ask questions and meet other artists from around the nation.

This past weekend, The St. Francis Canterbury Fellowship at K-State was host to the fourth annual conference at the Quiet Garden in Keats, Kan.

I was privileged to be among the gathering of artists in several disciplines including music, visual art, dance and writing. Through meditation and professional workshops, these participants focused on turning ideas into finished works.

The theme of this year's conference, "In God's Eye," suggested the unique relationship men and women have from being made in God's image.

Among the attributes of the Creator that we possess is the ability to create, to be artists.

Conference speakers brought wisdom and experience in their respective fields. Among them, Chicago area portrait artist Kristy Pokorny, who lead workshops in visual art and meditation, gave an opening presentation describing her art as a reflection of her spiritual journey.

She also discussed trends in art and the public's reception of her work.

"In the '80s," she said, "It was very difficult to show any work that had Christian themes. Today this is changing, and spirituality is again being accepted as legitimate artistic expression."

Under the guise of open-mindedness, the art scene was closed to religious expression during this time, she said, but this has changed in recent years.

"In the '90s we have seen a rebirth of religious themes, and now is the time for Christians to emerge as prominent artists."

The difficulty is that people of faith are frightened.

Art is the voice of a culture, but would-be Christian artists get minimal training or even avoid the art scene all together, afraid of a system perceived as secular or immoral.

The conference focused on breaking the stigma that Christian self-expression should be confined to Bible commentaries and Precious Moments greeting cards — a stigma often held by Christians.

Self-expression is about self, and uncertainty about how work will be seen by viewers and critics should never hinder the artist from being true to emotions and experiences.

I believe that for the Christian, this means letting the joy and struggle of life as God's child become works of art.

And if the artist wishes to support himself or herself through art, then training, experience and support from fellow Christians become even more important.

The conference closed with a "Celebration of Creativity," where conference participants were invited to share work with each other.

The message of the weekend was that sharing our many forms of self-expression helps us to understand each other and to better become the family God intends us to be.

▶ TRANSACTION FEE ADDS EXTRA $1 TO $1.50 FOR BANK WITHDRAWALS.

ALECIA TERRELL
Kansas State Collegian

Managing money has traditionally been tougher for college students because they are in their first years of financial independence. With the growing number of ATM machines in the area, students might find it convenient to take cash out when needed.

But students might be unaware that along with the cash, some ATMs charge an additional $1 to $1.50 for users who aren't members of that particular bank.

"This is where many people get in trouble," John Musselman, vice president of Kansas State Bank, said. "People use the ATMs so frequently that they forget to record the transactions in their checkbook. It's just like writing a check. You have to write it down."

Musselman said the transaction fee partially goes to the installers of the machines. He said the money goes through a network in a series of links.

If the fees are too high and usage drops, Musselman said some banks lower their fees.

"It's like a free-enterprise system," he said. "If you didn't have usage and you were charging a dollar, you might go to 50 cents. When people are willing to pay the more expensive surcharge and the machine has frequent usage, the bank tends to keep the more expensive fee.

He said a good example of this process is the K-State Student Union.

"There are three machines in the student union, and the transaction fees should be relatively low," he said. "The students actually have a choice in this situation. Each machine represents a different bank, so they're all going to have different surcharges."

Musselman said opening a bank account in the Manhattan area may be more practical for students.

"As students become more grounded in the Manhattan community, where they're more on their own and not depending on mom and dad quite so much, it's a good idea to establish a good banking relationship with a local bank," he said.

Pat Dembkowski, customer service officer for Commerce Bank, said the most important advice he would give college students is not to carry around their card's pin number.

"If a card is lost or stolen with the pin number written on the back of the card, it causes lots of problems," he said. "Also, I would stress the importance of writing down all of your transactions, because when people stop keeping track they tend to bounce several checks, and it turns out to be a big mess."

Musselman said one of the significant targets for stolen ATM cards are college residence halls.

"Sometimes people get their purses stolen, and if they have pin numbers on the backs of their cards or have them written down somewhere, they will probably be in a world of hurt," he said.

GOP halts environment plan

▶ REPUBLICANS SOFTEN TALK ON ENVIRONMENT, BLOCK CLINTON'S PLAN.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The shrill partisan rhetoric over environmental regulations — a hallmark of the Republican revolution three years ago — no longer echoes on Capitol Hill. Gone are the calls to strip the Environmental Protection Agency of its power or to gut the Endangered Species Act.

But the abandonment of frontal assaults on environmental regulations doesn't mean congressional Republicans are ready to embrace President Clinton's top environmental priorities.

From a modest package of tax cuts and incentives to address global warming to new efforts to clean up the nation's waterways and purchase new parkland, the Clinton environmental agenda is being blocked at every turn.

"Congress once again is pushing back in the wrong direction," Vice President Al Gore said Tuesday during an appearance in advance of today's Earth Day. Using a park as a backdrop, he accused Republicans of "cozying up to the worst polluters and trying to drag down our environmental standards."

Clinton is expected to follow the theme as he visits the Appalachian Trail today where he will criticize Congress for failing to approve a string of public land initiatives offered by the administration.

Republican congressional leaders maintain the disputes simply involve disagreements over spending priorities as well as serious doubts — voiced by both Republican and Democratic lawmakers — about the global warming agreement the administration agreed to last December in Kyoto, Japan.

Examples of the disagreements:

• The president's five-year $6.3 billion package of incentives to promote energy efficiency and give tax breaks for more fuel-efficient cars and buildings — an early effort to address global warming — is all but dead. First lawmakers withheld funds from the program, then the money was stripped from the Senate's budget blueprint.

CLINTON

• A highly touted clean water initiative to address agricultural runoff into lakes has been blocked for lack of money. A proposed $568 million never made it into the Senate budget and faces trouble in the House.

• More than $300 million approved last year for nearly 100 purchases of federal land for parks and refuges is in limbo over a disagreement about how the money should be spent. Another $92 million Clinton proposed for public land improvements next year also is in jeopardy.

• An additional $650 million, earmarked by the EPA to speed Superfund site cleanups also is not being funded. Lawmakers are refusing to reinstate a Superfund tax until the controversial law is revamped.

"Congress has learned to be more surreptitious," said Rodger Schlickeisen, president of Defenders of Wildlife. "There's not as much chest beating. Now they're being much more cautious in their approach. But there's still an anti-environment agenda."

Congressional Republicans, both moderates and conservatives, scoff at such criticism.

"There's no doubt in my mind there's a heightened sensitivity to environmental issues," said Sherwood Boehlert of New York, a moderate supported by most environmental leaders. He blamed the administration for not pushing some environmental issues, such as Superfund reform, more aggressively.

"This Congress is not anti-environmental," said Rep. Jerry Lewis of California, whose Appropriations subcommittee deals with the EPA's budget. But he said there are concerns about some administration proposals.

For example, he said, the clean water plan would impose new burdens on states without adequate federal funds and require pollution permits for large hog and cattle feedlots. Approval of the administration's $568 million request for the clean water program is uncertain, even though much of that money would go to states, Lewis said.

Welfare dependence decreases in county

▸CASH ASSISTANCE FALLS IN U.S., RILEY COUNTY; MORE PEOPLE WORKING.

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

When the federal government passed the welfare reform act in 1996, its intentions were clear — to get people off of welfare and into jobs.

Two years later, statistics indicate that the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Act is working. Fewer people are receiving cash assistance, release rates from state doles are the highest in decades, and cash-assistance expenditures for Social & Rehabilitation Services offices are dropping.

Riley County is no exception.

Cash assistance dropped $324,806 between fiscal year 1996 and 1997 in Riley County, according to an SRS report, and the average number of families in the the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program dropped from 805 to 566, or about 30 percent. The number of children in the program dropped by 25 percent.

The area management report from the Manhattan SRS office, which includes an eight-county area, shows about 24 percent fewer cases with cash recipients were opened in the 1997 fiscal year. Fewer people receive food stamps, too.

As the numbers of recipients and dollars in cash-assistance programs continue to drop, and as new rules that limit welfare assistance take affect, SRS offices have refocused their priorities.

Kip Lee, chief of income maintenance at the Manhattan SRS office, said if potential clients look able-bodied, questions about how long and hard they've looked for a job are the first ones asked.

"It is different from what we used to do," Lee said. "Our target is to get people to work, not give cash assistance.

John Maxwell, a special investigator for the state, works to uncover cases of welfare and child-support fraud in the Wichita area. He said he agrees that putting people to work is a good idea, but wonders what will happen when the current economic boom subsides.

"Instead of a cash-assistance program, it's more geared towards finding jobs for people, which is a good idea except nobody has tested what will happen when the economy goes south," he said.

Maxwell said attention on government job-training programs designed to put people to work might fool the public into thinking it is saving more money by lowering the amount paid in cash assistance.

"Currently there is a billion-dollar program which makes people who have been unemployed for over 30 months eligible for more job training," he said. "The only problem is that, in theory, somebody could get up to $25,000 just for job training.

The new federal guidelines haven't been in effect for long, but some think the promising statistics are too simplified and a little misleading.

Jacque Gibbons, associate professor in sociology, anthropology and social work, said determining the success of welfare reform with its emphasis on job training is hard because once a person leaves the welfare rolls, no follow-up tracking is done to determine if the job training was successful.

"All of the so-called success is going on in the context of a good economy, too. The real money coming from the pockets of taxpayers is for medical assistance, not cash assistance," Gibbons said.

The expenditures for medical assistance in Riley County, which include pharmacy, physician and outpatient consumers, was $9,917,374 in fiscal year 1997 — more than 10 times the amount paid in cash welfare assistance.

Gibbons said he questions if cash-assistance cuts will save money in the long run.

"The real question is this, if reform is working so well," Gibbons said, "how do we explain the increased demand on other social services, like emergency shelters?"

In 1996, the Manhattan Emergency Shelter housed 27 families. The shelter provides housing, food and other services for families and individuals in crisis. Last year, 147 families used the shelter.

Of the 428 people who stayed there in 1996, 276 were newcomers. The total number of users jumped to 525 in 1997, and 324 were new to the shelter.

Shelter Director Junell Norris said the increase can't be attributed directly to welfare reform, but it might play a role.

"Of course, I can't say that the increase is all because of welfare reform, that's too much of a generalization," Norris said. "But 90 percent of the families came in here with a serious crisis, ones that SRS might have been more willing to take care of before reform.

▸JAPAN FALLS 9 PLACES IN WORLD-WIDE RANKING OF COMPETITIVE NATIONS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAUSANNE, Switzerland — Struggling Japan plunged to 18th place on the list of the world's most competitive nations last year, while the United States stayed in the top spot, a survey released April 15 shows.

Japan's nine-place plunge in the World Competitive Yearbook annual rankings reflects the economy's complete disarray, the report said. Only five years ago, the country was in second position.

The United States, in contrast, maintained its No. 1 place thanks to free-market policies like privatization and a flexible labor market, the survey said.

"The United States is strongly installed in its position as the most competitive nation in the world," said Stephane Garelli of the yearbook's Lausanne-based publishers, the International Institute for Management Development.

"Only a major crash in the stock market or, in the long term, complacency, could threaten a situation which is historically exceptional," Garelli said.

The study compares the competitiveness of 46 countries by measuring economic strength, the domestic economy's openness to international trade, government policies, financial services, infrastructure, management, science and technology, education, and training.

It defines national competitiveness as a country's ability to help keep businesses competitive.

Singapore and Hong Kong had second and third places, respectively, as they did in 1997. Singapore has been less affected than its neighbors by the Asian crisis but will be affected by the region's general slowdown, Garelli said.

China jumped to 24th from 27th place. Economic efficiency and reforming the role of the state now seem to be a priority for the Chinese, Garelli said.

Policies that have generated staggering growth helped propel Ireland up the table to 11th from 15th place, the report said.

"Ireland continues to be the Tiger of Europe," Garelli said.

Britain fell to 12th from 11th place. Germany retained the 14th place it had in 1997. Switzerland remained in seventh position.

France dropped two places in the rankings, to 21st from 19th. The country still has a substantial public sector and high unemployment, but it is making good progress in opening its economy to international markets, Garelli said.

The Netherlands climbed to fourth from sixth place, and its neighbor Luxembourg also improved, moving to ninth from 12th place. Russia remained at the bottom of the table in 46th place.

March unemployment rate decreases

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The state's unemployment rate decreased again in March, in part because more people obtained government or relatively low-paying service jobs.

The jobless rate in March was 3.6 percent, down from 3.8 percent in February, the Department of Human Resources reported Tuesday. The department said it was the lowest rate for March since 1974.

The department attributed the drop to seasonal factors. For example, employment by government agencies increased, it said, because students returned from spring break to work. In addition, service employers, such as hotels and plant nurseries, began adding employees.

But the state's unemployment rate also is a sign of its continuing strong economy.

The unemployment rate in March 1997 was 3.9 percent.

During the past year, the state's civilian labor force — the number of Kansans working or actively seeking work — has increased by more than 61,000. In addition, the number of people with jobs has increased by about 64,000.

"Because of our strong economy, this truly is a workers' market right now in Kansas, and we don't expect that to change anytime soon," Wayne Franklin, human resources secretary, said.

More than 1.35 million people had jobs in March. About 50,000 were unemployed.

The two largest parts of the nonfarm economy — trade and services — were among the leaders in job growth over the month.

Wholesale and retail trade companies added about 1,300 new employees over the month. Services companies added 2,200 workers.

But government agencies outdid them both, hiring about 3,500 workers over the month. Government agencies employed more than 246,000 people in March.

The unemployment rates in two of the state's four largest metropolitan area decreased in March.

In the Wichita area, the jobless rate decreased from 3.1 percent in February to 2.8 percent in March.

Yugoslavia finds prison space for Bosnian war criminals

ASSOCIATED PRESS

THEHAGUE, Netherlands — After years of seeking suspects to fill its cells, the Yugoslav war crimes tribunal is now trying to find cells for all its suspects.

The space crunch highlights a recent change in the fortunes of the U.N. court, once branded ineffective for its apparent powerlessness to have suspects arrested.

Its 24-cell detention unit long held just two or three suspects. Now it's more than full, with 26 of the tribunal's 74 publicly indicted suspects in custody.

With NATO forces in Bosnia grabbing indicted suspects by force — and a moderate Bosnian Serb leadership increasingly ready to cooperate — surrender suddenly might not look so bad to those still on the run.

Though the tribunal's top suspects remain at large, seven Serbs have arrived at the tribunal in The Hague since mid-January; four of them surrendered and three were arrested by NATO.

"What is being promoted by the free (Bosnian) media is that for some of these people, turning themselves in is less risky than perhaps being snatched by NATO forces," said John Heffernan of the Washington, D.C.-based Coalition for International Justice, which promotes the work of the Yugoslav and Rwanda war crimes tribunals but is independent of them.

The U.N. detention block, built for the tribunal inside a Dutch jail, has only one-person cells. Anticipating accommodation problems, tribunal authorities planned to house extra suspects in the jail.

But the contingency plan might not be perfect. Tribunal officials Tuesday were investigating a complaint by suspect Zoran Zigic that his cell — apparently in the Dutch jail — has no running water or toilet, as the tribunal cells do.

The tribunal's turnabout seemed to begin last July, when British troops sent to arrest two Serbs in northwestern Bosnia fatally shot one as he opened fire on them.

"It led to a greater amount of fear (among indicted suspects)," Heffernan said.

The January election of moderate Bosnian Serb Prime Minister Milorad Dodik also has greased the wheels of justice at The Hague.

Shortly after his election, Dodik said he would let NATO arrest the tribunal's most-wanted suspect, former Serb leader Radovan Karadzic. He was last seen in public in September 1996 but widely is believed to be still in Bosnia.

After meeting senior Bosnian Serb officials in Banja Luka this week, the tribunal's chief prosecutor, Louise Arbour, said she was looking forward to increased cooperation. The vast majority of the 48 suspects still at large are Bosnian Serbs.

The exodus of suspects to The Hague has revived news reports that Karadzic, indicted twice for genocide, is preparing to surrender.

But observers temper their optimism with skepticism.

"We have heard this before. I will believe it when I see it," Heffernan said.

Meanwhile, the tribunal — housed in a former insurance company's headquarters — is bustling like never before.

Four trials are under way, rotating in and out of the tribunal's single courtroom. Two more trial chambers are being built and likely will be ready this summer.

Fort Riley man stabbed in Aggieville altercation

▸ POLICE APPREHEND SUSPECT; VICTIM TRANSPORTED TO HOSPITAL.

JAKE PALENSKE
Kansas State Collegian

A Fort Riley man was stabbed at about 11 p.m. Wednesday night outside Espresso Royale Caffe in Aggieville.

The victim, whose name wasn't immediately available, was in Silverado Saloon when the altercation began.

A witness, Blanca Alcantar, Santa Maria, Calif., said she and the victim were inside Silverado Saloon together when the assailant assaulted her.

"He came up to me and said, 'Did you break the bottle?' and I said that I didn't know what he was talking about," Alcantar said.

"Then he threw beer on me and hit me, so we went after him to see what his problem was, and my friend got stabbed."

Alcantar said neither herself nor the victim knew who the assailant was.

The victim was transported to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue for treatment.

"Right now we are stabilizing the patient and looking into surgery, but we don't have any more information," said Vicky Livengood, nursing supervisor at Mercy Health Center.

Riley County Police Department officers on the scene said a suspect had been arrested, and Officer De Fronce said there is an ongoing investigation.

More information will be available today, she said.

Apartment fire forces victims to leave homes

JOHN HENDERSON AND JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Seven former residents of 1410 Watson Place are doing well and have moved into new apartments at the Chase Manhattan Apartments complex after a fire forced them out early Sunday morning.

"They're coping and trying to get things cleaned," Shannon Glaser, Chase Manhattan property manager, said. "We've transferred them to different apartments."

Manhattan Fire Department officials have determined that the fire began on the balcony of Apt. 19, on the third floor of and spread inside.

The alarm was pulled at 4:14 a.m. Sunday, and when the fire was out, there was about $133,000 worth of structural damage to third-floor Apts. 19 and 20, second-floor Apt. 11 and first-floor Apt. 3.

Chuck Tannehill, assistant director of emergency services for the fire department, said the exact cause of the fire has yet to be determined, but he can rule out the fault of Chase Manhattan or the residents. No one was

Council calls meeting to discuss hazing allegations

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

The National Pan-Hellenic Council had an emergency meeting last night to discuss the group's position on the possible hazing incident that occurred on Saturday evening.

The meeting, called by Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost of Diversity and Dual Career Development, was closed for nearly 90 minutes before the media were permitted.

Taylor-Archer said the meeting was closed because it allowed for free discussion among those present.

"It was an opportunity for the traditionally black Greek organizations to come together to discuss the issue," Taylor-Archer said. "They needed an opportunity to openly share."

Several of those present said they felt the meeting showed them that the members of the Pan-Hellenic Council needed to work together to deal with this situation and others that might develop in the future.

"We talked a lot about coming together as a community to handle this situation," said Stacy Yeager, representative from Sigma Gamma Rho and senior in management and information systems.

"We're now more aware that we need to come together and police ourselves better," said Omar Davis, a member of the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity and senior in psychology.

"This means chapters checking up on other chapters, plain and simple."

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said he agreed the meeting occurred primarily to help members of Pan-Hellenic improve their ability to student govern.

Bosco, who suspended the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity on Monday, also said he wanted a chance to discuss his actions with members of Pan-Hellenic.

"I hadn't had a chance to talk to the Pan-Hellenic Council. I wanted a chance to explain exactly why I did what I did and to get some feedback," Bosco said.

During the meeting, Bosco proposed the Pan-Hellenic Council adopt the anti-hazing policy already being used by Greek Affairs.

Greek Affairs governs the majority of K-State's fraternities and sororities but has no control over fraternities or sororities that are members of the Pan-Hellenic Council.

"Right now we're going to look this over to

3 greek houses to ban alcohol from premises

BARBARA HOLLINGSWORTH
Kansas State Collegian

This is the fourth in a weeklong series about alcohol use and abuse by K-State students.

The "Animal House" image is on its way out.

Drinking will no longer be a part of fraternity living for three houses. By the year 2000, Sigma Nu, Phi Delta Theta and Phi Gamma Delta will have dry houses.

"There may be more," Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said. "I know a lot of national fraternities are discussing it this summer at their national conventions."

▸ What do we think?
The editorial board favors students who drink taking more responsibility for their actions.

While going dry could become a trend, these won't be the first dry houses on campus. FarmHouse always has dry, and Alpha Gamma Rho and Beta Theta Pi are dry. All sororities also are dry.

"I think our dry status is a tremendous asset," said John Gaither, FarmHouse president and junior in agricultural economics. "I think it greatly improves the quality of facilities we're able to maintain. Cleanliness, general appearance are impossible when alcohol is in the picture. I believe, and the fraternity believes, the fraternity and alcohol are separate."

Speaker to promote diversity, education during youth empowerment conference

High school and middle school students from around Kansas will gather Saturday in Forum Hall for the first Youth Empowerment Day.

Hispanic American Leadership Organization and Midwest Desegregation Center are sponsoring the event, where students will learn about issues addressing youth today.

The program stemmed from a 10-week summer program that Leo Prieto, president of HALO, put on last summer. When Prieto returned to K-State in the fall, he said he wanted to do a similar youth program at K-State.

"This has never been done before," he said. "Typically we target our recruitment programs to high school seniors who are going to college.

"We thought we could begin when they're younger and target those who are planning to go to college and those who are not," Prieto said.

Prieto said Youth Empowerment Day will help expose youth to higher education.

"We want to get it into their head that it can happen," he said. "We thought we could focus on opening their eyes to the opportunities at K-State."

HALO faculty adviser Lori Navarrete said Youth Empowerment Day is a service to the community.

"One of the goals of HALO is to support youth and community," she said. "In particular we want to encourage youth of color and make them aware of post-secondary opportunities."

The agenda for Saturday includes a financial-aid information workshop, a panel of K-State multicultural ambassadors to answer questions, a tour of campus and a speaker.

The speaker is Luis Cordova, also known as "El Duke." He is a social worker and counselor from Kansas City, Mo.

"He is an excellent motivational speaker," Navarrete said. "He's a youth adviser, and he's got a broad range of experience working with gangs and equity issues.

"He's a cultural attitude adjuster. That's how he defines himself on his flier."

Cordova will speak to the youth about staying in school, going to college, overcoming obstacles, setting and meeting goals, and cultural sensitivity.

Navarrete said she anticipates 50 to 75 youths to attend.

"This is kind of a pilot, and we geared it toward a small audience so we can learn about the needs of the students," she said.

GOP leaders urge Gov. Graves to push his proposal for cost-of-living increases

TOPEKA — Democratic leaders are urging Republican Gov. Bill Graves to promote more forcefully his proposal for a cost-of-living pension increase for all state retirees, saying Graves' leadership is needed to overcome GOP resistance in the Senate.

Sen. Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, and Rep. Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, the two minority leaders, called on Graves during a Statehouse news conference on Wednesday to submit to the Legislature a $30 million budget amendment to fully fund the governor's COLA proposal.

Paying for the pension increase up front — as opposed to amortizing it over 15 years — would neutralize the objections of Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, and other Senate Republicans, the Democratic leaders said.

They said Graves' submission of a budget amendment to provide $57.4 million more for school finance broke a stalemate over education funding before the Legislature took first adjournment on April 10.

A similar amendment could break the pension COLA deadlock as well, they said.

However, Graves' spokesman, Mike Matson, said there would be no budget amendment forthcoming from the governor's office.

"The governor stands by his proposal to amortize the cost-of-living adjustment over 15 years," Matson said. "It is still the most fiscally responsible way to address this issue.

"The governor continues to be very supportive of the proposal he put forth in January — a 3-percent raise for every single retiree in the system."

Matson said Graves believes his plan is the most reasonable and fair one advanced.

"We are eager to work hard for it in the wrap-up session and are hopeful and optimistic that we can convince a majority that it is the proper way to go," Matson said.

Providing the 50,000 retirees under the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System with a 3-percent cost-of-living increase could be the most contentious issue to be resolved when the Legislature reconvenes next Wednesday for its scheduled four-day wrap-up session.

The biggest difference between House and Senate versions of a KPERS COLA is who should be given it — all retirees, or only those who retired prior to July 1993.

The difference in cost is between $28 million for the pre-1993 retirees and $58 million for all retirees.

Postal truck's brakes checked recently, deemed in good condition before wreck

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The brakes on a runaway truck that crashed into an apartment building and killed a sleeping girl were in "good shape" and had been checked recently, a U.S. Postal Service official said.

But a union official said post office tractor-trailers often are old, frequently overloaded and difficult to maneuver.

A postal truck veered off an exit ramp of Interstate 35 on the city's west side Tuesday morning and crashed into the apartment building, killing Nicole Valles and injuring her brother, Dario Valles. The boy was in fair condition Wednesday at a hospital.

The children's parents, Manuel Valles and Jenny Salazar, had minor injuries and Ana Gloria Jaco, who lived in an apartment above the family, escaped unharmed.

The truck drove a hole through one wall of the house and out the other.

The driver, Sinclair L. Taylor, 27, jumped out of the truck just before the crash and was not seriously hurt.

The brakes on the truck had been checked within the past six months, and at least half of the brake pads were intact, said Larry W. Hudson, manager of vehicle maintenance for the post office.

Hudson acknowledged that trailers had been overloaded in the past.

"Whether this one was overloaded or not, I can't say," Hudson said, adding that drivers can refuse to pull overloaded trailers.

Ray Johnson, head of the union division that represents drivers, said "some of the trailers are pretty old; some are prehistoric."

U.S. Department of Transportation investigators went to the scene and weighed the truck. Hudson said he was not told what the truck weighed.

Police said they found no rubber marks on the asphalt that would show the brakes had been used. Police could not say if the brakes failed or if the driver did not apply them.

Taylor declined to comment.

A spokeswoman for the Jackson County prosecutors office said Wednesday it was too early to tell if any charges would be filed in the accident.

Police said they had 27 reports of accidents at the intersection since Jan. 1, 1997.

The truck was carrying bulk business mail from a nearby post office facility to a major post office facility. About 15 or 20 such trips are made daily.

Hemophiliacs with AIDS to receive funds to compensate for contaminated blood

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A House committee approved a bill Wednesday to exempt from tax a proposed settlement for thousands of hemophiliacs who contracted the AIDS virus through contaminated blood.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Porter Goss, R-Fla., would establish a $750 million settlement fund to compensate hemophiliacs infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, due to contaminated blood between 1982 and 1987. An estimated 7,200 hemophiliacs would qualify for $100,000 payments from the fund.

Hemophilia is a hereditary condition that results in excessive bleeding due to inadequate coagulation of blood, and people suffering from this condition receive frequent blood transfusions. The bill is named for Ricky Ray, a 15-year-old Florida boy who died of hemophilia-associated AIDS in 1992.

The House Ways and Means Committee unanimously agreed to exempt these payments from federal taxes. The bill also says the payments won't threaten a hemophiliac's benefits under the Supplement Security Income system.

Goss said the settlement fund was necessary because the federal government failed to protect the blood supply.

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

With the help of his classmates, Nate Thompson-Weaver, a fourth-grader at Lee School, carried a heavy piece of landscape timber through the small crowd of people. "Watch out," he said, as he tossed the timber down on the ground.

Thompson-Weaver and other volunteers met on Wednesday at Lee for Community Service Week, a national week dedicated to serving others.

K-State students, community volunteers and Lee employees and students all helped with the construction of the new garden that the school received funding for from an Outdoor Wildlife Learning Site grant last summer.

Thompson-Weaver said he was thrilled to have the garden.

"I think these vegetables will be exciting," he said.

"I like to see things grow, and I like constructing stuff."

The OWLS grant was sponsored by the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks. There are only three other OWL sites in Manhattan. Lee was the fourth.

The Community Service Program at K-State helped organize the service project to get more university students involved as part of Community Service Week.

"We wanted a place where children could study plant life and observe neighborhood animals like birds, squirrels and rabbits," said Linda Mathews, project coordinator and fourth-grade teacher. "We want to teach them firsthand about conservation."

Mathews said one of the district's goals is for students to become lifelong learners of nature.

The garden will be part of their science curriculum and a hobby for the students who are members of the Lee Garden Club.

K-State's Horticulture Club contacted Lee with interest in using the garden for a community service project. The Construction Science Club also is building a shelter roof for an outside concrete pad, allowing shade and a place for picnic tables.

"I think this is a real hands-on connection to the Earth, and if we're going to teach children to conserve and respect, we have to do it through real-life experiences," Mathews said. "The children who have worked in the garden feel a real ownership to the things that are growing there."

Jeanie De Armond, junior in horticulture therapy and secretary of the Horticulture Therapy Club, began her volunteer work at the Lee garden last summer. The club put in a vegetable garden and donated plant materials and seed composition.

"I like getting the kids involved in the environment. It's like play to them," De Armond said.

Volunteers at the garden drilled, hammered and shoveled gravel for a new walkway leading to the garden. The children pushed the wheelbarrows and planted new flowers.

"I'm planting marigolds," said Sarah Beebe, a third-grader and member of the Garden Club. "The crowds of people in one way is good because we can get a lot done faster, but there is a good chance of a flower getting stomped on.

"I like being outside because when you're inside you're trapped, and you don't get to work with Mother Nature," she said.

Twenty-seven K-State students volunteered to help at the garden. Greek members from Alpha Tau Omega, Alpha Xi Delta, Delta Upsilon, Kappa Sigma and Lambda Chi Alpha helped with the garden.

"The garden is a contribution to the community and to the children to learn about their surroundings," Kae Olsen, first-grade teacher, said. "The fact that K-State has taken such an interest in the garden is remarkable."

Drinking laws, rules should be strictly enforced

Eradicating underage drinking and advocating the mature management of alcohol should be the goals of all campus-related living groups at K-State.

The residence halls have established a series of rules not only to govern alcohol consumption by residents of legal age but to decrease situations in which underage drinkers have access.

These rules include placing the responsibility on resident assistants and residents not to supply minors with alcohol and prohibiting the amount of cereal malt beverage that can be stored.

K-State's Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils both have established a substance-abuse policy and risk-management indicators to educate students in the greek system about responsible use of alcohol. The movement toward dry houses within the greek system is a step in the right direction.

Aggieville bars also play an important role in decreasing underage drinking by obeying strict laws that fine minors in possession.

All the laws against underage drinking and alcohol abuse-related crimes and all the rules within campus-related living organizations can only go so far in curbing this problem.

In other words, all rules have to have bite. Rules are important, but a reduction of underage drinking and alcohol abuse will only come with strict enforcement.

There have to be tough consequences for breaking the laws or rules of these organizations.

Rules must not be loosely written and enforced. Campus groups and university administrators need to be realistic about the problems with alcohol use and abuse on campus and in campus-related living organizations.

The concern with drunken driving, for example, has been dealt with realistically with the organization of designated drivers. Underage drinking and the use of alcohol at campus-related functions needs to be regulated with strict enforcement and tough consequences.

No matter how many rules and laws are made, a reduction in underage drinking and the responsible use of alcohol requires participation and individual involvement. It takes individuals to make a difference.

Wagging the Rottweiler

Outlawing vicious dog breeds does not solve problems

The recent conviction of Milford's Sabine Davidson on involuntary manslaughter charges stemming from a fatal attack by her three Rottweilers on 11-year-old Christopher Wilson highlighted a problem that has been emerging for many years.

How does a society that continues to become more and more urbanized deal with breeds of dogs that were originally developed to meet the needs of a much different population?

For instance, while arguments persist about the exact roots of the Rottweiler, the breed's heritage is clear. Named after the German village where the current-day characteristic look of the breed was thought to have been clearly defined, the dogs originally were bred to be "butchers' dogs."

Nowadays, that says little. But before the days of pre-packaged chubs of ground beef delivered by refrigerated trucks, the concept said plenty. A butcher would purchase beef "on the hoof," at the village market, and drive the cattle back to his troubadour.

SCOTT ANDERSON/Collegian

Figuring a Rottweiler into the picture is a no-brainer. Even today most Rottweilers will demonstrate their strong herding instinct when given a chance. Using their muscular bodies, Rottweilers can be effective drovers, directing their charges in the proper direction by bumping them with a well-placed shoulder. So when Herr Metzgermeister needs to drive the cattle home, he takes along his dog.

A heavy-bodied Rottweiler keeps the cattle moving in the right direction. Once there, the bull must be dispatched, but only after exercising.

The Rottweiler is large enough to hold his own against the heavyweight bull, eventually wearing the bull down to a sweaty heap.

At the end of the week, the Rottweiler pulls a small draft cart laden with the butcher's products to the market. Afterward, when the butcher is more than a bit tipsy from a stop at a tavern, and has a pouch full of coins, his Rottweiler serves as a suitable theft deterrent.

Where does this leave the Rottweiler today? Bred for the size and intelligence necessary to fulfill a number of diverse roles, most Rottweiler owners will admit quickly that a bored Rottweiler is almost always an extremely destructive animal.

But should all Rottweilers be outlawed? Definitely not.

Outlawing a breed removes the onus of responsibility from other dog owners while eliminating the privilege of responsible ownership for those who have earned it.

The Shawnee County Commission is dealing with the realities of the issue. In 1991, on the heels of reports of pit bulls being the guard dogs favored by drug dealers trying to protect their stashes, and the natural aftermath of such stupidity (maulings by pit bulls mistreated by ignorant owners), the commission passed a resolution restricting the ownership of Staffordshire bull terriers, American Staffordshire terriers, American pit bull terriers or any dog with the predominant features of those breeds.

The commission said it hoped such restriction would eliminate the danger of pit bulls in Shawnee County. While a proactive attitude should be applauded, because it seeks to eliminate problems before they lead to irreparable consequences, the commission's methods must be condemned as reactionary and short-sighted.

Only one pit bull was ever registered, demonstrating that there was probably never a pit bull problem in Shawnee County. Instead, the resolution has left animal control officers dealing daily with numerous calls about "vicious dogs" roaming rural areas, with no effective means of stopping the problem.

If the officers can't prove the dogs are unregistered pit bulls, they have little hope of charging the owners with any crime. For even when officers suspect a dog as being a pit bull, few people are qualified to definitively classify a dog as a pit bull based on appearance.

Moreover, the difference between a Miniature Dachshund and a Great Dane is similar to the difference between myself and Shaquille O'Neal; despite the cosmetic difference, no laboratory test exists that would discriminate between the two of us, if one already did not possess information regarding our blood type or blood samples from family members.

Shawnee County should heed the recent request of the animal control officers and institute some form of "vicious dog" resolution that would allow them to ticket owners of animals that appear dangerous and are allowed to roam unrestricted. Owners who allow dogs to develop into vicious animals and roam freely have completely shirked the responsibility they assumed the day they acquired their dogs. Besides, a "vicious dog" resolution would satisfy their original intent of protecting the public from nuisance animals.

Simultaneously, though, the commission should repeal its pit bull resolution and provide an example of common sense for other counties of Kansas. Banning specific breeds of dogs is reactionary by nature and a product of ignorance.

Many breeds were bred to perform specific tasks and are apt to become destructive if not allowed to channel their energies effectively, but dogs of any breed will become destructive if not cared for responsibly.

Many people are surprised to learn that some of the breeds most popular with police K-9 units, Dobermans, Rottweilers, and German shepherds, are also among the breeds most popular with therapy dog organizations, which train dogs for visits to nursing homes, pediatric clinics and juvenile care homes.

Is the world coming to an end? No. Global warming, deforestation, air pollution and the infamous El Niño bombard the average TV viewer worse than the plagues themselves, but the world as we know it will be around for a while.

What is coming to an end is accurate reporting — hysteria and pessimism are rampant.

How better for a Greenpeace volunteer to become famous than to think of a new plague that imminently will cause world destruction?

In 1798, Thomas Malthus used impeccable logic to warn of a massive famine in England. He argued that while the population doubled (1,2,4,8), food supplies increased sequentially (1,2,3,4). Everyone panicked and ran for cover. When the smoke cleared, they still found food on the table.

In 1914, the U.S. Bureau of Mines predicted that American oil reserves would last 10 years. Wrong. In 1939 and again in 1951, the U.S. Department of the Interior said oil reserves would last 13 years. Obviously, they were both wrong, too.

In the early 1980s, acid rain was reported to have wiped out 23 percent of all trees in Europe. Environmentalists warned that acid rain would devastate most forests in Germany, causing erosion and severe reduction in crop-producing land.

What happened? They recovered. The damage all but disappeared. Forests did not decline. They thrived.

Today's environmental plague centers around global warming. Although not to be ignored, it's not necessary to start stockpiling food and to begin building an underground shelter. How better to motivate a populous to your cause than to scare them? This is the tactic employed by many environmental crusaders.

In the years before the first millennium, religious leaders warned of great physical strife and plagues associated with the second coming of Jesus Christ. Their only logic was the number of the year itself. People sold all their personal belongings and others committed suicide. The year 1000 came and went.

Now we're coming across the second millennium.

Pope John Paul II has instructed his subordinate clergy to preach the Book of Revelations, the real logic being that if Jesus doesn't come as the ball drops for the year 2000, then we have millions of new churchgoers and more money.

I called Kenny Kingston's psychic hotline. Because he predicted I will be president one day, I figure the year 2000 is not the end of the world. Actually, I am more worried about the ingredients in Twinkies than the end of life itself. While everyone is running for cover, I will be able to find a parking stall on campus.

Environmentalists are quick to accuse their big business opponents of having biased interests for not supporting every emerging environmental cause. Take a closer look at the hypocritical nature involved with this stance.

Greenpeace's income, fame, advancement and even its very existence can depend upon supporting the most alarming versions of an environmental scare. The whole aim of this type of politics is to keep the populace alarmed, and therefore ready to be led to safety. Members menace people with an endless series of hobgoblins, all of them imaginary.

As noted before, if it's not depletion of natural resources, acid rain or global warming, it will be something else just as terrible that is sure to wipe out life as we know it. Take all these scares with a grain of salt.

This type of propaganda has been around for hundreds of years.

Committee thankful for charitable books

Editor,

On behalf of the Student Senate Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee, we would like to take this opportunity to thank the management of the K-State Union Bookstore for its cooperation in the Bridge to Asia Program.

Bridge to Asia is a nonprofit organization that provides books and educational aid to China and Southeast Asia.

During the 1997 fall semester, the Academic Affairs Committee implemented Bridge to Asia at K-State and participated in the program by donating about 500 used books to Third World countries.

The bookstore provided the collection and storage facilities as well as financial support for shipping the donation. The program's success was dependent upon the above actions taken by the bookstore.

Bridge to Asia is a continuous effort by K-State, and book donations are taken throughout the academic year at the bookstore.

Collection bins will be set up again in the bookstore during the book buyback period this semester.

If students have books that are not needed and can't be sold back, we strongly encourage a donation to this worthwhile program.

Again, we appreciate efforts taken by the K-State Union Bookstore to ensure the success of this program.

Reader says column promotes stereotypes

Editor,

I might as well start this off by saying I am a white male.

Those of you reading this, I am sure, started to think I am a racist pig and I am writing to say I hate anyone else who doesn't match the color of my skin.

You didn't?

Well, maybe Pamela Manning should look a bit further as well.

You see, I was raised in "the Deep South," Texas I might add, and I am the only white kid in my family.

I have two brothers and a sister who are black. My parents, who are white, decided to adopt because they wanted more children. The looked past an infant's color and gender and took in three small children and raised them in a happy home.

Not once was it even a question why they were of another race. Who cares? I didn't. No one ever came up to me and said anything. My life wasn't changed. Why is it that every time someone has a problem in life, they blame it on color or race or gender? Why do we see people in categories? Manning, we don't.

It seems to be a wonderful cop-out to say the color of one's skin has made it harder to get a job or make one's way in the world. It's an easy fallback. "I am different, so anyone who doesn't agree with me is putting me down" is a great battle cry.

But what about me?

Try going to a World Wide Web site to look up scholarships and finding two or three out of some 50,000 even apply to you.

No one wants to be the one who posts a scholarship for "white males in need of money." When minorities have scholarships it is seen as a way to "better themselves" and "help make a difference." But you know what it really does? It makes a division.

It tells these groups that everyone is not equal and separation needs to be maintained.

This is the now, Manning, and something that happened 200 years ago didn't directly affect you at all, and you know that.

If you were born in 1798, I could side with you, but truth is, America is as equal as it gets. Back then, my relatives were discriminated against, too. Irish folk were seen as dogs, and we were white. This, however, is the now.

Sure, at times we hear of people siding with racist views and doing crimes against others, but when you live in a country of some 270 million, incidents happen.

If only 1 percent of the United States had racial issues, that's 2,700,000 people. It's the problems we as humans must deal with.

And I know we all want to say we need to change that 1 percent, but fact is, diversity happens. Don't say whites are out to get you or you won't get a job in the South because you are a black woman. In my eyes, that puts you in that 1 percent.

And while I am on the stand, I would like you to know that three out of four of my past employers were black women, the most recent being at Commerce Bank in Kansas City.

If you say this is a rarity, then so be it, but I will live my life with the belief that we are all equal, and that my brothers and sister and I have no difference except the taste in our music and how we comb our hair.

You can take your views and spend your time figuring out how everyone is going against you every day. We'll see where we end up in 50 years.

Student challenges quality of intramurals

This is in response to D. Scott Fritchen's column in Tuesday's Collegian. I don't want to make any of the Scoreboard players mad, but let's not confuse intramural softball with competitive softball. The lowest class in the United States Specialty Sports Association is class E. A mediocre E team would beat any intramural team to death. Intramural softball is RPO, "Recreational Purposes Only." So what, Scoreboard scores lots of runs. I would be willing to bet a new DeMarini that most of the teams they play have players who cannot catch a fly ball. I play class-A ball in the summer. I have played teams such TPS/Hooters (12th in the nation), Fun Bunch/DeMarini (23rd in the nation), Guys/Easton (18th in the nation) and class AA Joplin Floor Design (14th in the nation). Go play one of these teams and see what happens.

Not only can these teams hit, but they also can play defense. Unless you hit a home run or a line-drive base hit, you are going to be out. It's not like intramurals where you can hit a lazy 250-foot pop-up and get a home run out of it.

Now for the home runs and their distances. I believe those players probably hit the ball that far. Understand, 390 feet is a long way to hit a softball. It's pretty rare to see a 400-foot shot unless there is a little wind to help. The difference between a class-A player and a class-E player is consistency.

While Scoreboard players might hit that distance a few times a year, a good class-A player is capable of hits like that quite often. Carl Rose is a major player, and he averages 430 feet on his home runs, but he is probably the best hitter in professional softball.

What I am trying to say is that when these Scoreboard players hit those long balls, they probably had a pretty good tail wind and did everything just right. We went out and hit balls Tuesday afternoon on the field that faces the volleyball courts. With a 15 mph tailwind, I hit three into the volleyball courts and 13 past the snow fence out of 25 balls. That's consistency. Just curious, why didn't the Scoreboard players participate in the intramural home-run derby? Not enough competition?

I won the derby, and I hit the farthest ball, which traveled 367 feet into a 10 mph head wind. That was not estimated, rumored or believed to be, it was measured and in the books. If I am wrong about the Scoreboard players, I apologize, but until I see it, I don't believe it. Call me, and let's go hit some balls. I am ready to back up my claims.

Reader says practice what you preach

Editor,

I am writing in response to Pamela Manning's column on Tuesday. I am a white male.

Manning wrote her column in response to a letter to the editor by Renee Hurla. I will agree that it wasn't the best written letter, but it did express her viewpoint. The fact of the matter is that Pamela Manning's column was full of the same biased, stereotypical whining that she was condemning.

To start with, let me address the point of Manning's response to Hurla's comment about no organization helping to fund the education of non-minorities and the fact that there are no laws protecting white males. Manning responded, "Sister, let this black woman ask you why those who caused these problems in the first place, more than 200 years ago, want or deserve the assistance that they stripped from others." The operative phrase here should be "200 years ago."

I don't recall, in the past 20 years of my life, oppressing any particular minority group. In fact, at one time, more than 100 years ago, my great-grandfathers were the minority group.

They were non-English-speaking citizens, and they had to put up with the same prejudices that everyone else encounters because they were immigrants and they were white males. I know that 200 years ago injustices happened, but I don't feel this generation or I should be held responsible for something that somebody did two centuries ago because I have the same color of skin.

I don't know if Manning is so uninformed that she truly believes every white male in the country is part of the Ku Klux Klan, or every non-minority believes the doctrines of the KKK, but I am truly offended to be stereotyped and grouped with that organization just because of the color of my skin. And I do not recall the last time I was offered any type of financial aid by the KKK because I am a white male. I guess I missed that application.

Manning's biased commentary does not stop there. She continued with the news story about the rejection of the affirmative action regulations for radio and TV broadcasting. She said, "What this essentially means is that there's pretty much no mandatory rule for cultural diversity in broadcasting."

Actually what this essentially means is there is no government quota requiring that certain people are not allowed jobs because of their ethnic background. This essentially means that even if I am qualified for a position, but the quota for white males is full, then I am denied a chance at a job because of my skin color. If fairness in hiring is what people are worried about, look no further than equal opportunity employment.

She then presented the scenario of her applying for a job in the "Deep South" alongside a white male of lesser qualification. She said, "Can you honestly tell me I'll get that job?" Well, I can honestly say you won't get that job with that attitude.

Nearing the end of her column Manning suggests that everyone should, "Just give the high-five to anyone striving for self-betterment."

I just wondered when self-betterment was limited to minority groups. I was under the impression that even us white guys can better ourselves if we want.

I am for the advancement of any group that has been oppressed in the past, but I am afraid that I am offended by the idea that I, as a white male, should be held responsible for the actions of white people in the past whom I have never met because they died 200 years ago.

In my life I have been subjected to oppression in the forms of stereotyping, reverse racism and gender discrimination. And all of this because I am a white male.

I guess I am just whining.

Commissioner might leave Big 12 for Olympic position

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Steve Hatchell, who helped form the Big 12 Conference and became its first commissioner, might soon be leaving under pressure, sources told The Associated Press.

Hatchell recently has interviewed for a top position with the Salt Lake Organizing Committee, which will oversee the Winter Olympics in 2002.

"I would not be surprised if we are interviewing candidates to be commissioner when we hold our spring meetings (May 18-21)," a source close to the situation told the AP. "There may be a vacancy."

Ray Bowen, president of Texas A&M, has been appointed spokesman for Big 12 presidents on the matter and could not immediately be reached. Bowen was quoted by the Fox affiliate in Kansas City on Wednesday night as saying Hatchell was "interested in change. We've got some management problems there, and there might be some people glad to see him go. He's very demanding."

Hatchell, reached in Dallas where the Big 12 is headquartered, denied he is being forced out.

"This is the second full year for the conference and everybody's worked hard and we've had to do an awful lot to get up to speed, and I know there are some people who are unhappy," Hatchell said.

"It's been three very long years, and I informed President Bowen months ago that I was going to begin looking at other opportunities. Dr. Bowen and I have talked a lot about that. I'm on that schedule, and we've been working in that direction."

Sources said Hatchell's problems stemmed from his treatment of the staff at Big 12 headquarters in Dallas.

"It has to do with treating people with respect," a source within the Big 12 told AP. "You have to treat everybody, high and low, male and female, with respect. Within the staff, maybe that's not happened."

"Yes, you absolutely do," Hatchell said. "We brought a lot of people together, and we've had to work very hard in two years to get everyone up to speed. And sometimes the work and the effort was overwhelming for all of us."

Among the names mentioned as possible replacements are Joe Castiglione, athletics director at Missouri, and Bob Frederick, athletics director at Kansas. Frederick finished runner-up to Hatchell when the Big 12 presidents met in March 1995 to select the new league's first commissioner.

Hatchell, a former commissioner of the Southwestern Athletic Conference and executive director of the Orange Bowl, said in a recent interview he was "getting very weary of the constant pressures" of the job.

Division I athletes may have part-time jobs, NCAA rules

OVERLAND PARK, KAN. — Division I athletes may hold part-time jobs, the NCAA board of directors ruled Wednesday.

"It definitely passed," Bridgit Niland, head of the NCAA's student-athlete advisory committee, told The Associated Press.

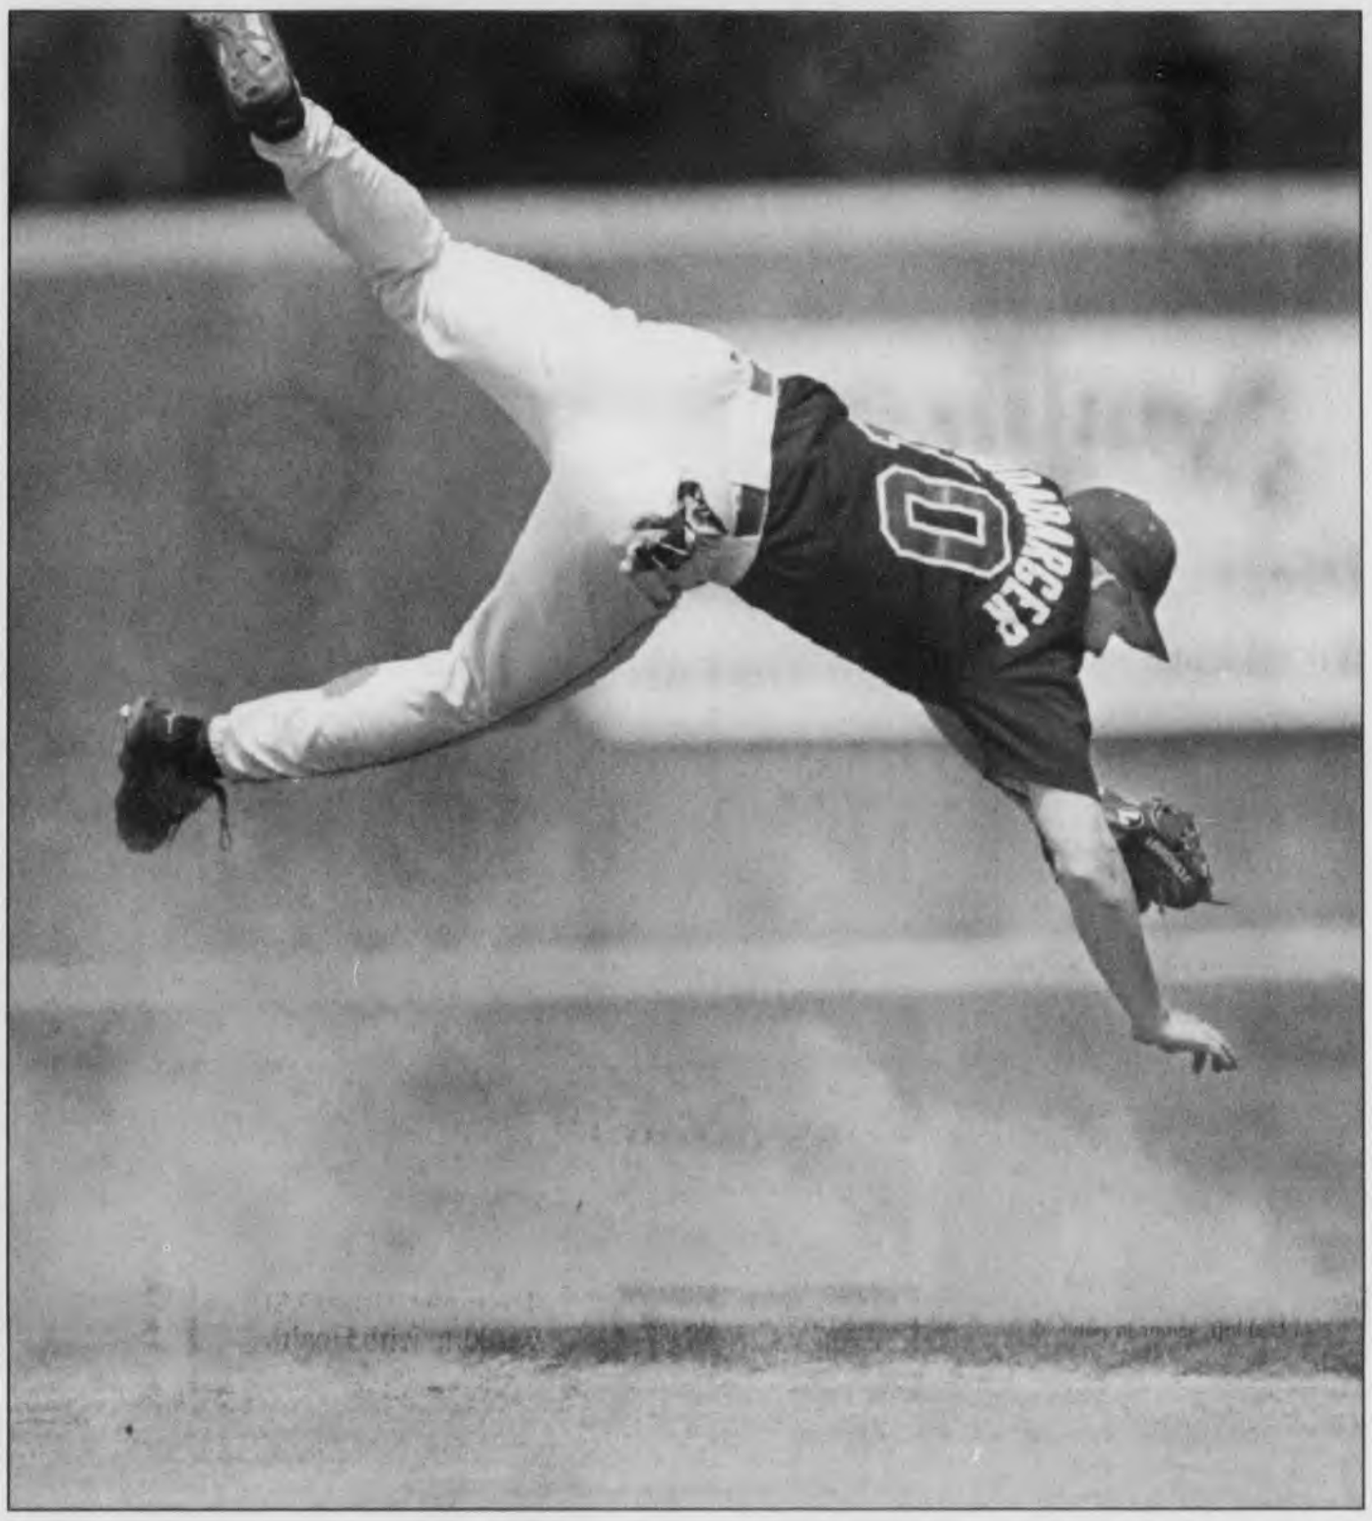
The board, which consists of college presidents and has ultimate power in the NCAA's new structure, met in Indianapolis and adopted a recommendation made last week by the NCAA management council. A formal announcement was expected later in the day.

For the first time in decades, athletes at the roughly 300 Division I schools will be able to hold part-time jobs, even if they are arranged by their school's boosters. They cannot make more than $2,000 every year.

"This really shows the optimum the NCAA can operate at if it chooses to," said Niland, a former runner at the University of Buffalo. "It was a piece of legislation that was really thought through. They really did consider the welfare of the student-athlete instead of just saying they were."

Opponents of the rule, including many coaches and athletic administrators, fear the potential of abuse in which some athletes will be given money without working. Many also are worried that high-profile recruits will now demand jobs with scholarships.

"It's going to be a disaster," K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury said.



A similar right-to-work rule was adopted by majority vote of the NCAA's Division I schools in January 1997 in the last days of the association's old governance structure.

But the board of directors, in its first important act as the NCAA's new governing body, suspended it just as it was about to take effect last August.

Under provisions adopted by the management council, the right-to-work rule will permit Division I athletes to earn a maximum of $2,000 per year over and above the value of a full scholarship. It also would allow athletic department staff members or boosters to help line up jobs for the athletes.

Many fear that allowing boosters to line up jobs for athletes will lead to cheating. Another concern is that some schools will have advantages in recruiting. There are more job opportunities in Miami or Los Angeles, for example, than in Knoxville, Tenn., or Stillwater, Okla.

K-STATE SPORTS INFORMATION

The K-State men's baseball team lost the rubber match of the three game series 7-1 to the Baylor Bears on Wednesday at Frank Myers Field.

Baylor jumped out to an early 1-0 lead in the top of the first with Charley Carter's RBI double, scoring James Blair. The Bears added runs in the third and sixth before putting the game out of reach with three in the seventh to make it 6-0, Baylor.

For the Bears, Kip Wells set a single season record for strikeouts in a season with 112, and Carter set a single season record for runs with 68, as well as tying the season record for home runs with 16 on his solo shot to lead off the eighth.

The Wildcats were led by catcher Yancy Ayres who had his 20th multihit game of the season on two singles. Left fielder Quinn Cravens kept his hitting streak alive. The four-game streak was extended on a second-inning leadoff single. Third baseman Josh Marn and right fielder Andy Silva added two hits for K-State. Marn's two singles gave him his 17th multiple-hit game of the year, keeping him in second in that category behind Ayres. All eight hits for the Wildcats were singles.

Chris Traylor picked up the loss for the Wildcats, dropping to 1-5 on the year. Traylor did pitch well for the Cats, going seven 1-3 strong innings, striking out eight Bears. Wells got the win for Baylor, moving to 10-4 on the year.

The Wildcats will be back in action Saturday with a three-game series in Ames, Iowa, against Iowa State.

Saturday's doubleheader will start at noon.

Cats possibly to face Jayhawks in Big 12 tennis tourney

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State tennis team is on a collision course with Kansas in the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

However, the Wildcats must first get by the Oklahoma State Cowgirls when the tournament opens play at 9 a.m. today in Lincoln, Neb.

The Cats defeated the Cowgirls to begin their current winning streak, dominating Oklahoma State 7-2 in Manhattan.

A win over the No. 10 Cowgirls would set up a rematch with the No. 2-seeded Jayhawks. The Jayhawks beat the Cats 8-1 earlier in the season.

However, the Cats were without one of their seniors, Lena Piliptchak, in singles play and dropped several of the singles matches in three sets.

K-State coach Steve Bietau said the Cats aren't looking past Oklahoma State, though.

"It is important that we respect their capabilities because they do have some weapons," he said.

The conference schedule has played out about the way Bietau said he thought it would for K-State, with a series of close meets.

"The season turned out a lot like I anticipated it might," Bietau said. "Kansas and Texas set themselves apart. And after that, it was an incredibly close race from third through ninth."

However, many of those close matches ended up as 5-4 Cat losses early in the season.

"It's been pretty disappointing, the fact that we have lost so many 5-4 matches," Cat Dinah Watson said.

Recently, though, the Cats have turned things around. They have a four-meet winning streak, including two wins in close matches.

If the Cats had won a couple of those 5-4 meets early in the season, they would have been able to improve their draw and avoided Kansas and Texas until later in the tournament.

But Bietau said that is behind the team, and it has to look forward to the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

"This is a new season," he said. "The only thing that carries over is the draw, and there is nothing we can do about that now."

The late-season surge by the Cats improved their record to 10-10 overall, 6-5 in the Big 12, earning a No. 7 seed.

The Cats said they hope to ride their current momentum to a good showing in the Big 12 Tournament and are looking forward to the meet.

"I am excited to play Oklahoma State," Eva Novotna' said. "I hope to get another chance to play the girl I played last time because I lost."

To succeed in the tournament, the Cats are going to need to improve their doubles play. Recently they've had the lead after singles play but struggled to close out the meet in doubles.

"Our singles play has come along well," Bietau said. "I'm concerned about our doubles. I don't think we are getting as much out of our doubles as we can."

To this point, the Cats success has started at the top of their lineup with Yana Dorodnova.

"Yana has had a very good year," Bietau said. "Individually, if you are looking for our best, you have to take Yana."

She has played strong all season, with wins over several top-100 players including the No. 5 player in the country.

"I'm pretty happy with my individual play so far," she said.

"My net play has been the best part of my game."

Other players have made great contributions as well. Watson has been playing very well, including sweeping her two matches at Nebraska in the Cats' final regular season meet.

"I have probably played better this year than I have in all the previous years," Watson, senior in kinesiology, said.

Two freshmen, Anna Pampoulova and Martina Pospisilova, also have contributed at the No. 2 and 3 spots, respectively.

Pampoulova has played tough competition, but done well all year, Bietau said.

"She's played well enough to put herself up in a pretty high position," he said. "We forget she is still a freshman. She's been a big boost to our team."

Pospisilova joined the team in early March and began contributing immediately.

"She is still a first-semester freshman," Bietau said.

"But she has played better every week she has been here."

The Cats said they are confident in their abilities and feel they are ready to compete with the rest of the Big 12.

"We have such a talented team this year and have had a little bit of bad luck by losing so many close matches," Dorodnova said.

Baseball too concerned with stadiums, should focus on state of game

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS

Sun Dee is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send e-mail to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu

In an attempt to learn more about the game I know the least about, I enrolled in Robert Linder's infamously popular "History of Baseball" class.

And I've learned more about the game in the past four months than you could shake a bat at. This class is a must-take if you can't eat peanuts or Cracker Jacks without breaking into Harry Caray's favorite song, or if your significant other says you mutter "Baseball Tonight" highlights in your sleep.

This is not me buttering up my teacher for a good grade, I promise. Tuesday in class, we got into a discussion about the state of the game today, which sparked this column idea.

And we came to a conclusion.

Basically, it sucks.

It's nice to pretend the fans still aren't ticked off about the players' strike. But they are. And they're staying away from the ballparks in droves.

The players cry if they get hurt, if they get thrown at, if they don't agree with an umpire or if they don't keep up with their teammates' paychecks — more crying than NFL or NBA players, it seems.

And with no salary cap and no gutsy commissioner to rein them and the game itself in, what exactly do they have to cry about?

Not that they don't deserve millions of dollars. They do play 162-plus games, and their March-through-October schedule probably seems a lot longer than that (especially for teams such as the Cubs or the Phillies).

But as the players whine, bitch and switch teams, the fans stay home and switch channels from the Wednesday night doubleheader to "Dharma and Greg" and "The Drew Carey Show."

It's gotten so bad, stadiums are moving away from the Wrigley Field, traditional feel to become multimillion dollar advertising billboards/family entertainment centers.

These new-wave stadiums cater to fans in ways football and basketball probably never dreamed of (or needed to). Well, I take that back.

I'm sure the Ballpark at Arlington, Texas, isn't the only stadium in the United States that a mere $1,660 will buy a season's worth of curbside valet service.

But the day Marty Schottenheimer asks for a 50-yard line pool with a swim-up bar, like the one at Bank One Ballpark in Phoenix, will be the day I quit watching football forever.

As a tremendous Braves fan, I was saddened to be in Atlanta last summer on the day the city imploded Fulton County Stadium.

The local news showed the clip every five minutes, and it was hard to watch the demolition of historical moments, such as Hank Aaron's home run record, the numerous World Series moments over the past decade and the Olympic athletes using the stadium as a waiting room for the 1996 Opening Ceremonies.

Attempting to accept change, I decided to go down to Turner Field and take the 1 1/2 hour tour the new stadium was promoting.

For my $7, I was the victim of a Coke advertisement. What once was the 1996 Olympic Stadium now looks as if a giant Coke bottle threw up red pop on it. The color red is everywhere. And a Coke bottle made of baseballs, bats, gloves, bases, catcher's gear and other equipment actually does throw up fireworks after home runs and wins.

The area with the Coke bottle also offers kids a place to play interactive baseball games while their parents sip beers on the outfield patio. No need to sit with the monsters and teach them the game — computers and well-meaning Turner Field employees can do it for them.

The tour led us everywhere, from the third-tier seating where Coke has promised to hand over $1 million to the person who catches a home run ball (Never mind that only one-eighth of the area is fair territory and the statistician from Yale who was consulted said there was only a one-in-a zillion chance it could happen) to the dugout and the locker room.

Right outside the training rooms is a multihole putting green with a hole from Augusta National painted as a mural behind it on the wall.

Apparently, the highest-paid members of the most talented starting rotation in the majors were complaining of boredom when they weren't the man on the mound at Fulton County. Teddy promised them a putting green in the new stadium if they could help pull off a World Series win.

I guess they're not bored anymore.

I thought the song said, "Take me out to the ballGAME," not "ballpark."

That's why I go. For the game. How about you?

Facility accepts waste products

WYNN DALTON
Kansas State Collegian

Each spring students pollute Earth with hazardous materials.

After attempting to pass move-out inspections and getting their rental deposits back, students throw gallons of unused paint and bottles of unemptied cleaners into the trash.

Gary Yenzer, regional manager for Big Lakes Regional Household Hazardous Waste Facility, said even small amounts of chemicals pollute large quantities of water.

"A pint of oil contaminates 750 gallons of water," he said. "When it contaminates your underground water, what are you going to drink and what are your kids going to drink? And our kids' kids, what are they going to have to drink?

"When you ruin your water that's underground and don't have anything to drink, are you going to pay big bucks to get it cleaned? So it's better to take care of it now," Yenzer said.

Drain cleansers, abrasive cleaners, bleach, rug cleaners, paint, stain removers and many other products have specific disposal requirements often ignored by consumers.

In Riley County, the Big Lakes facility is trained in discarding those products that are hazardous to Earth and to people if they are not disposed of correctly.

The facility will take auto-care products, chemicals, cleaning products, paint products, pesticides and fertilizers, and some personal-care products, such as insect repellent.

Once products are received by the facility, bulking occurs to most products. Bulking means mixing the paint, varnish and stains together. After they are blended, the end product is shipped out as recycled fuel. Once the bulked products reach their destination, the user blends them with regular fuel and reuses it.

The facility provides this free service to a 10-county area including Riley County.

Yenzer travels throughout the 10-county area collecting household hazardous waste at scheduled drop-off points. He said the facility also will go to the homes of the elderly and disabled who are unable to transport their waste to the facility.

"We try to give the public the easiest way possible to get rid of the stuff," he said.

Partially funded by grants, the Big Lakes facility is supported primarily by tipping fees generated by those who use landfills.

Steve Galitzer, director of environmental health and safety and chair of the Riley County Solid Waste Committee, is in charge of disposal of K-State's hazardous waste.

Galitzer said the beginning of the Big Lakes Regional Household Hazardous Waste Facility is because of his efforts in 1990 to find a way to reuse the large amounts of pesticides generated by the university. During that year, legislation was passed that increased requirements for hazardous waste disposal, and a grant was given to Riley County to begin a household hazardous waste facility.

Yenzer said the continuation of the facility was because of the public's demand for the facility.

"There was a big cry from the public to have a place for it, to get rid of it," he said. "There was a big demand for it. They wanted it."

Since that year, the facility has grown. Last year 6,320 people participated in this service. For each person, $27.96 is spent to dispose of hazardous materials.

Yenzer said he believes Manhattan is a good location for this type of facility.

"Manhattan is a transit-type community. You've got the college and Fort Riley. People move in and out all of the time," he said. "Of those people, they all buy paint to paint their living room walls. They usually buy more than they need. Now they can bring me the paint, and I recycle it."

Yenzer said the objective of the facility is to keep the products out of the landfill.

"You don't want to contaminate the soil," he said. "I've worked with chemicals for 20-some years and the biggest thing is you don't spill it on the ground. Over the years, I've grown more environmentally conscious."

Big Lakes Regional Household Hazardous Waste Facility is on Tuttle Creek Boulevard and is open from 7:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday.

On the second and fourth Saturdays of each month, waste is collected from 8 a.m. to noon at Howie's Recycling at 625 S. 10th St.

Committee chairs to be sworn in at Student Senate

ANDREW D. WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Tonight will mark a transition in the leadership of Student Senate.

Senate Chair Gabe Eckert will swear in people to lead the seven standing committees of Senate. After reviewing the 20 applications turned in for the positions, Eckert chose chairs for the 1998-99 Senate session.

"It's great to see so much interest in these positions this year," he said.

Eckert said everyone who showed interest was qualified for their respective positions.

"Everyone who applied was qualified," Eckert said. "I was really impressed."

Rhett Trujillo, senior in agricultural economics, will be sworn in as the Academic Affairs and University Relations chair.

Trujillo, as last year's chair of the committee, said he already was familiar with the academic affairs committee's duties.

"Our committee deals with any issues that students bring to us," Trujillo said. "We worked on the fall break proposal and the Books to Asia Program."

Carlton Getz, junior in architectural engineering, will be the Allocations Committee chair. The Privilege Fee Committee chair will be Jeff Meder, a sophomore in finance who was a member of the Privilege Fee Committee this past year.

Robin Cates, sophomore in social work, will be chair of the Student Activities and Social Services Committee after a year as Communications Committee chair.

Cates said she already has started forming goals for the committee.

"My goal is to do a lot more community service," Cates said. "I would like to see the Senate hook up with another campus group and go out into the community. This will help us get to know what other groups are doing."

Lisa Dethloff, senior in political science, will chair the Governmental Relations Committee. Josh Rengstorf, senior in feed science and management, will be chair of the Student Senate Operations Committee. Mary Bosco, freshman in food and nutrition science, will lead the Communications Committee. Eckert said committee chairs have a great deal of responsibility.

"They help the Senate save time by looking at all the small details, and then they can make a recommendation to the Senate on what, if any, action we should take," he said.

Leaders of standing committees:

Rhett Trujillo – Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee chair

Carlton Getz – Allocations Committee chair

Jeff Meder – Privilege Fee Committee chair

Lisa Dethloff – Governmental Relations Committee chair

Robin Cates – Student Activities and Social Services Committee chair

Josh Rengstorf – Student Senate Operations Committee chair

Mary Bosco – Communications Committee chair

Finding shows more Americans want to learn about Holocaust

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — One of five Americans don't know or aren't sure Jews were killed in the Holocaust — or that it happened in World War II — according to a survey commissioned by a museum dedicated to telling the story of its victims.

But the Holocaust Memorial Museum took heart Wednesday in findings that showed a large majority of Americans want to learn more about Nazi Germany's murderous campaign in hopes of preventing future genocide.

Eighty percent picked the Holocaust as one of history's most important lessons — behind the American Revolution and ahead of American Indians' struggles, the civil rights movement, the Vietnam War, slavery and the Cold War. And 66 percent wanted to know more about the Holocaust.

"This history is still not over. It's still unfolding," acting museum director Sara Bloomfield said, noting alleged war criminals still are being brought to trial and nations are reassessing wartime roles. "I think that makes the Holocaust very relevant to Americans, especially when there's present-day genocide in Bosnia and Rwanda."

In one provocative question, Americans were asked, "Should we put the Holocaust behind us or continue to discuss it?" Eighty-three percent said keep discussing it, 10 percent said put it behind us and the rest were undecided.

Bloomfield said most Americans recognized that "the Holocaust isn't just a tale about what the Nazis did to Jews, but it's about what some human beings did to other human beings. There's a lesson for everyone in that."

3 Classy Cats make NFL sidelines as Kansas City Chiefs cheerleaders

After intense preparation, three K-State seniors have made their way into the NFL. However, these seniors won't be on the playing field. They'll be supporting the team on the sidelines.

Classy Cat dancers Trisha Langford, public relations; Kelli Sweeney, kinesiology; and Robyn Pierce, public health and nutrition, are three of the newest members of the Kansas City Chiefs Cheerleading Squad.

"We've gone professional now," Langford said. "This is the highest level we, as cheerleaders, can go."

Making the cut

After attending an informational meeting and a workshop to learn the dance and cheer, round one began Saturday with 100 women performing. Forty women were then cut, leaving the rest to do the routines again in round two. The women were also asked to explain to a panel of judges why they wanted to be a Chiefs cheerleader.

The women then came home to wait until 10 p.m. to call The Kansas City Star information line and enter a code to find out if they made the cut.

"I was so relieved just knowing I had made it into finals," Sweeney said. "I didn't expect it at all. I just wanted to give it my best shot."

Sunday morning, the three K-State women returned to Kansas City for the third and final round of the selection process.

A closed audition finished up round three. Once again, the women were sent home to wait. Only this time, the final list wasn't expected until 3 a.m.

Finding out

Sweeney and Pierce went out to wind down from their stressful weekend, but broke down at 1 a.m. Monday and called the information line to see if the list had been posted.

"We called from Scoreboard and the recording was on, so we hung up," Sweeney said. "We didn't want to find out in a bar."

Instead, the women hurried home, where anxiety won out and Pierce made Sweeney listen to the call.

The names were called in alphabetical order and Sweeney heard Langford's name first. Then came Pierce's.

"It was hard being at the end of the alphabet," Sweeney said. "I was relieved just to hear their names, but I thought, 'What if they made it and I didn't?'"

But she did.

"When I heard my name, I started crying," Sweeney said. "My life was on hold while I waited to find out. I had a job offer in Kansas City and one in Wichita. I'm taking the Kansas City job and at that moment my life finally came together."

Langford also experienced shock. She, too, hoped for an early decision and called around 1 a.m. as well.

"As soon as they got to the H's, I's, J's and K's, my body started going numb. When they said my name, I don't think I could feel anything," Langford said. "The first words out of my mouth were 'Oh my God.' I think I've said that to myself a thousand times since then."

Pierce didn't quite go numb, but said she felt only incredible excitement.

"I just can't believe we all made it. There was so much talent and so many girls," she said.

Having the edge

So what exactly was it that made these K-Staters stand out? Langford said she thinks it's in the presentation.

"I have an ability to express my desires, whether it be through my communication skills or my dance skills," Langford said. "And this was a really big desire for me. I love to perform and I think you can see that."

Sweeney attributes her success to the per-

CONSPIRACY THEORY

Against all odds

Despite risks, some K-State students find illegal gambling profitable, enjoyable

Many miles away from a casino or dog track, K-State might seem an unlikely place to find gamblers. They're here, though, and the lack of gambling venues doesn't hold them back. Neither does the law.

It is illegal to wager on sports in Kansas.

One such gambler is Chad, who wished not to be identified by his name because of his illegal activities.

Chad began gambling during the college football season.

"I was up in Lawrence and one of my friends was putting money down, and I was like, 'Hey, I'll put some money down,'" he said. "It paid off, so I just kept doing it. I didn't go over my bounds or anything and put thousands of dollars down, ever. Sometimes I wish I had, because I would've made quite a bit of money."

Chad continued to bet every week during football season. He usually bet no more than $500, he said.

"Sometimes I do one team for $300 or something. Sometimes I parlay some stuff," he said.

A parlay is when more than one game is bet on, but everything must win for there to be a payout. For each game that is bet on, the payoff nearly doubles.

"The only time I won a whole lot was when I parlayed some stuff because the odds are so much higher. You know, you put down $100 and then win five times as much," Chad said.

The most he won in a weekend was almost $600, he said. At the end of the season he had lost about $100, but had won $1,500 to $1,600.

Chad said he would continue to gamble as long as he were a student. Not everyone who gambles stays a gambler, though.

Another student, Paul, who also wished not to be identified, said he is quitting gambling even though he made money doing it.

> PAUL
> K-State student who gambles

He said he often won $100 on a $10 or $20 bet, but he knew the possibility of losing money was real, which happened to some men he knows at the University of Kansas.

"If it's illegal, I don't like to do it," Paul said. "I'd hate to get in trouble. It's not easy to get caught, but in the long run you probably lose money anyway, from most of the guys I've talked to.

"The temptation's there because you win money, but if you make one bad bet you can be done or get injured.

"A couple guys at KU I know lost over $3,000 betting, and they basically started kind of like I did. Just worked their way up, and got their heads big. That's kind of what I'm trying to avoid," Paul said.

Chad said he knows high rollers at KU, too.

"Some of my friends in Lawrence, they'd parlay a lot of stuff with pro and college in the same weekend," he said. "They'd make $5,000 one week and lose $6,000 next week."

Bill Arck, director of the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service at University Counseling Services, said gambling is more prevalent at KU because of the casinos nearby. Gambling is causing problems for some students there, he said.

"As I understand it, they have a therapy group for gambling addictions at KU," he said.

However, Arck said he didn't think gambling addiction was a big problem at K-State. He said he has dealt with a student whose Internet gambling had contributed to financial difficulties, though.

Some Internet gambling sites provide offshore sports wagering, which is legal. Other sports gamblers use bookies, who are people who take bets, or friends with connections in Las Vegas to place illegal bets.

Bookies are in effect becoming a one-person casino.

"I know people bet, and that there are certain people making money off of that because they can be the network. In a sense, be the bookies," said Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services. "And there's people that are losing money off of it because they're putting big bucks out there."

University Counseling Services doesn't keep statistics on whether clients are addicted to gambling, Newton said. However, that might change if the problem grows, he said.

"People out there are speculating that it is much more serious now than it was a few years ago," he said.

Art exhibit to feature Ecotoons

▶ CARTOONS FOCUS THEME ON ENVIRONMENTAL ISSUES, GAIN AWARENESS FOR NEED TO SAVE PLANET.

TODD PACEY

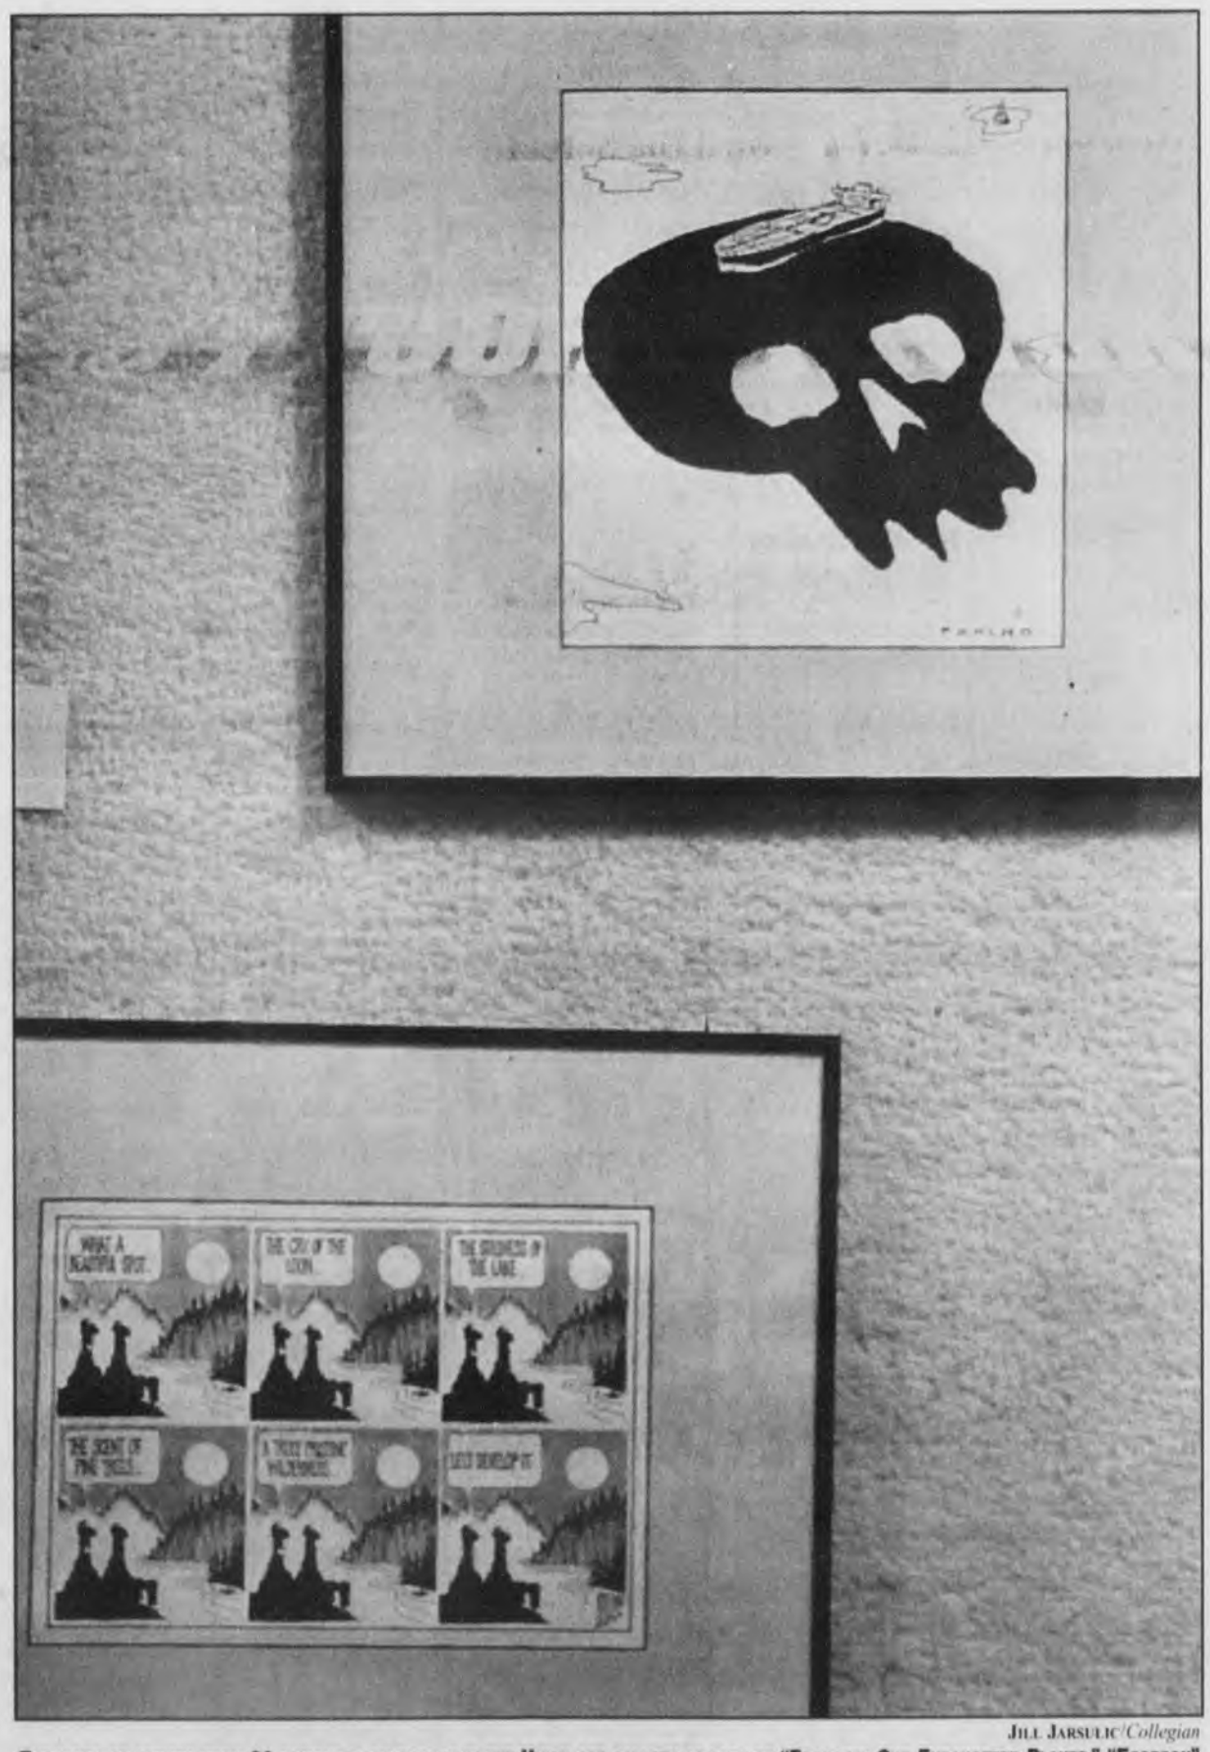
Smokey Bear told us only you can prevent forest fires, and we need to extinguish our campfires before we leave.

This idea of combining cartoons with an ecological message is the basis of the exhibit at the Union art gallery. "Ecotoon: Our Endangered Planet" features work by cartoonists from more than 30 nations in an attempt to save the world.

"Ecotoon" premiered at the Citizen's Summit on the Environment in Moscow in 1989. After touring the Soviet Republics the exhibit was featured at 1992's Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Since the Earth Summit the exhibit has been touring constantly.



Morgan Larson of Exhibit Touring Services, the company that manages the exhibit, said the exhibit has been touring only in the United States, but it could go back to being international. Larson said there are more than 100 pieces in the exhibit, not all of which are shown at the Union because of space limitations. All the original pieces from 1992 are still in the exhibit, Larson said.

"Ecotoon: Our Endangered Planet" will be at the Union art gallery today and Friday

"This is the biggest collection of editorial cartoons about saving the earth," Jennifer Griggs, program adviser for the Union Program Council Arts Committee, said.

Griggs said the goal of the exhibit is to gain awareness for the need to save Earth. The exhibit was chosen by the UPC Arts Committee to coincide with Earth Day, which was Wednesday. Pieces in the exhibit range from topics such as oil spills in the oceans to pollution to industrialization.

The exhibit, which will be in the Union art gallery until Friday, is the last exhibit this year sponsored by UPC Art.

Residents put pieces together after fire at apartment complex hurt in the fire other than a firefighter who injured his ankle.

Most of the items belonging to the tenants living in the lower floors were damaged by the water used to put the fire out. An estimated $82,725 worth of items were damaged.

"Our apartment was under four inches of water," said Meleah Rae Gearon, junior in advertising and marketing, who lived in Apt. 3 with Amy Releford, freshman in computer engineering.

The beds belonging to Breanna Moorhead, freshman in nutrition and exercise science, and Katherine Meisinger, freshman in interior design, were ruined. But two computers, a stereo and a television all survived the water that gushed through the ceiling. Moorhead had to buy a mattress that night to sleep on in her new apartment.

"I guess we're OK now," Moorhead said.

Moorhead said her homeowner's insurance covered her losses, although some items, such as her texts and notebooks from classes at K-State, will be hard to replace, especially so close to the end of the school year. She said her professors have been understanding.

"The scariest part was just watching it," she said. "We didn't know what we were going to lose."

Releford lost her computer and most of her and Gearon's large furniture. Releford said most of what was salvaged is in a large plastic bag, waiting for insurance appraisers to arrive later this week or early next week. A bag full of smoke-stained pillows, clothes, stuffed animals and other personal items waits outside the apartment.

"It stinks," Releford said. "We're keeping them out on the deck."

Christian Muck, sophomore undecided, lived in Apt. 20, but was out of town the day of the fire and didn't return until midnight Sunday. He said he lost clothes, his computer and printer, a few coats and compact discs. A number of other items had smoke damage.

"Everything smells like smoke," he said.

The fire caused severe structural damage to Apt. 19, where Karla Jo and Kristi Jae Shue, seniors in elementary education, lived. Karla Jo Shue said she and her twin sister lost two computers, their television, stereo, VCR, both beds and most of their furniture.

Shue said they were able to salvage a table, desk and a dresser, along with most of their clothes. The two had lived in Apt. 19 for nearly three years.

Both are in the final stages of finishing their degrees, acquiring field experience as student teachers. Karla Jo Shue said she and her sister might have to make up a few days to graduate.

"The school's been really helpful," she said. "They'll let us make up days after graduation if we have to."

In general, Karla Jo Shue said she's very happy with the support from Manhattan and its citizens.

Gearon said McDonald's donated breakfast food to the firefighters and the displaced residents.

Moorhead said she didn't get free breakfast that morning, but probably wouldn't have been able to eat it anyway.

"I was too upset to eat," she said. "I didn't get anything until that evening."

Muck's parents drove to Manhattan to help him move, along with several friends. He said he's glad matters worked out as well as they did, but he's a little irritated that no one called him on Sunday before he returned to Manhattan on Monday. He missed classes all that day moving to his new apartment.

"I wish someone had called me, that's all," he said.

Gearon said she was thankful for help from her neighbors in the complex for helping her move. She also wanted to thank Alpha Xi Delta, Releford's sorority, for bringing flowers and donating a futon.

Gearon said Chase Manhattan also opened up its laundry facilities to her.

"I did laundry for five hours with the clothes that could be saved," she said.

Glaser said she was impressed with the positive attitude of the tenants who have moved and who are still cleaning. She said all the survivors of 1410 Watson Place deserve recognition.

Moorhead said she's thankful to be alive, although there's still a lot to worry about.

"I'll always remember freshman year, for sure," she said.

3 K-State seniors land spots as cheerleaders

ception of the judges.

"They can really see the real you," she said. "They looked at me and said 'She really wants to do this, and she's someone who'll give 110 percent,' and I will."

The future

All three women will graduate in May, and cheering at games isn't the only thing they have to look forward to.

"The Chiefs cheerleaders are really active in Lovefund. We donate time and attend thousands of public appearances," Langford said. "Sixty percent of the job isn't even on the field. There's a lot more to it than it looks."

Sweeney said she looks forward to the service aspect of the job.

"I think it's really neat they take advantage of being cheerleaders and letting us get into the community," she said.

Pan-Hellenic discusses allegations decide what we want to do about it," said Dwan Gardner, president of the K-State National Pan-Hellenic Council and senior in life science. "We'll meet again Sunday to discuss it some more."

Davis said that although the anti-hazing policy is not currently a policy of the National Pan-Hellenic Council, the group still does not condone that sort of activity.

"We want people to know that everyone doesn't haze," Davis said. "But when something like this happens, it reflects on everybody."

Taylor-Archer said the meeting provided the group with a chance to highlight some of National Pan-Hellenic's positives in the wake of the recent problems.

"It was an opportunity to reaffirm some of the good things that come out of this organization," Taylor-Archer said.

Davis also said it was important for the group to stick together through adversity, but not to simply accept misbehavior.

"We all need to support each other when we're doing what we're supposed to be doing. But we don't support this sort of behavior," Davis said of the alleged hazing. "If we do anything short of that, we're doing a disservice to ourselves."

3 more greek houses to go dry by year 2000

Dan Suellentrop, Sigma Nu risk-reduction chairman and sophomore in business administration, said it has taken awhile to get used to the idea of phasing alcohol out of the house.

"At first it seemed like it was a big deal," he said. "But as we started to read into it, it made more sense as far as liability goes and underage drinking."

Robel said liability has become a bigger concern for houses in recent years.

"I think the primary driving force is the liability," she said. "Chapters are finding it harder to get insurance at a reasonable rate, if they can get it at all."

Sigma Nu's phasing out of alcohol will take place in three steps. This year, for every function with alcohol at the house, it must have a dry one. During the 1998-99 school year the fraternity has to eliminate alcohol from all functions on its property and public areas of the house.

Suellentrop said phasing alcohol out of the house will make the house's environment better.

"A lot of people fall under peer pressure to go drink," he said. "As far as living groups going dry, it does reduce the pressure to drink. It's a move in the right direction to create a more comfortable living environment where there's more of a concentration on academics and intramurals."

However, underage members will find different pressures because alcohol might not be as accessible, Suellentrop said.

"I think it will put more pressure on people to go out to the bars, and you might see an increase in misdemeanor crimes, like MIPs, because it is pretty easy to come to a fraternity to drink when they're having a social function," he said.

Functions still can include alcohol with the change because the dry policy only applies to the chapter house.

"It won't really detract from anything social, because you just have to move a party somewhere else," Suellentrop said. "I don't think it will take away from any of the functions the chapter home will host."

Being a dry house won't detract from membership either, Robel said.

"The things I've read have indicated that recruitment is enhanced by dry houses," she said. "Certainly the chapters on this campus that are dry haven't had any problems recruiting at all."

Recruiting might not be a concern, but image could be.

The decisions to go dry came with added publicity from incidents at colleges where fraternity members drank themselves to death. In August, a 20-year-old died of alcohol poisoning at Louisiana State University's Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity house. An alcohol overdose killed an 18-year-old freshman at Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Phi Gamma Delta house in October.

"It has a negative effect," said David Butts, Sigma Chi president and junior in mechanical engineering. "A lot of incoming students are getting a lot more concerned about stuff they see in the news. I think at K-State we are doing all we can do to show that we are addressing this issue."

To encourage mature drinking habits, K-State's Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils have established a substance-abuse policy. One of the policy's goals is to "utilize the educational role which our chapters play in developing members' attitudes in fostering responsible use of alcohol."

Both groups also have developed risk-management educators. Butts served as IFC's risk management educator this year and said the local greek community educates about proper use of alcohol.

"We haven't had any of the catastrophes that other schools have had, and I think that could be attributed to that we have done a good job with education," he said. "We get the information out so people will hopefully make better decisions when they are out at the bars or a party or things like that."

Butts said they gave information to the chapters about drinking and had workshops in the fall for new members.

Education about mature use of alcohol is even more beneficial than becoming a dry house, Butts said. Members could sometimes be better off drinking on fraternity property than at bars or parties, he said.

"As far as going dry, I'm not sure that is the best solution," Butts said. "I think the best solution is education to show that you can drink in moderation and have a good time drinking alcohol."

Police release details of Aggieville stabbing

JAKE PALENSKE
Kansas State Collegian

Brian R. Rodrigues, a specialist stationed at Fort Riley, was stabbed around 11 p.m. Wednesday outside Espresso Royale Cafe in Aggieville.

The 20-year-old was inside Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon when the altercation began, witnesses said.

Police apprehended Carl William Mims, Overland Park, Kan., as a suspect in the crime. Mims was arrested, booked into the Riley County Jail and charged with aggravated battery. He was later released on $25,000 bond.

Blanca Alcantar, Santa Maria, Calif., said she and the victim were together inside the bar when the assailant approached them.

"He came up to me and said, 'Did you break the bottle?' and I said that I didn't know what he was talking about," Alcantar said.

"Then he threw beer on me and hit me, so we went after him to see what his problem was, and my friend got stabbed."

According to Lt. Herb Crosby of the Riley County Police Department, the stabbing was a result of the confrontation inside Chance.

"The assailant left the bar after the altercation there and was pursued down the street by anywhere from three to six people. The group of people confronted the suspect, and that is when the stabbing occurred," Crosby said. "We have talked to three or four of the witnesses in the area of the crime, and the investigation will continue today."

Crosby said the suspect fled from the scene of the stabbing and went into Silverado Saloon, about a block away from the crime scene. Two to three witnesses followed him into the bar. The suspect requested that the police be called, then exited Silverado through a back door. Mims was found hiding under a car in an apartment building parking lot south of Silverado.

Crosby said the weapon used in the stabbing has yet to be be located.

According to Deb Skidmore, public information officer at Fort Riley, Rodrigues is a member of Company D, First Battalion, 34th Armor division and is stationed at the fort as an M1-A1 tank crew member.

Rodrigues was transported to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue for treatment, where he is still hospitalized. According to Mercy Health Center officials, no information about Rodrigues can be released until he signs a consent form, which he is currently unable to do.

Mims' arraignment date has been set for Wednesday, April 29.

Students receive free legal advice

BARBARA HOLLINGSWORTH
Kansas State Collegian

This is the final installment in a weeklong series about alcohol use and abuse by K-State students.

Whether seeking legal advice about drinking charges or helping students stop drinking, K-State offers legal services for students.

Dianne Urban, attorney for legal services for students, offers free legal advice for students dealing with DUI, use of a fake ID and minor in possession charges.

"About the only one I can represent students in court for is minor in possession," she said. "For the other penalties, I would tell them they have to find their own attorney."

Students with an MIP charge could face a minimum fine of $200, 30 days in jail, 40 hours of community service or completion of a drug-and-alcohol education program, and a $102.50 court cost.

While Urban can represent people for MIPs, she said she rarely does.

"Most of the time, people don't have much of a defense, but if they have an argument, I've taken some cases," she said. "One fairly common one was that the person happened to be holding it for someone else. I've had a case of where there was a group of people in a bar that they were charged with possession of a can on a table, and it wasn't theirs."

It costs students $15 to have Urban represent them.

"It's really important to get some legal advice when you are charged with any of these things," she said. "For students, that advice is free."

One of the biggest problems minors can have is being caught with a fake ID, Urban said.

ANN HARTS, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE MANHATTAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, ANNOUNCES THURSDAY MORNING THE ARRIVAL OF SYKES ENTERPRISES INC. TO THE MANHATTAN AREA.

Chamber reveals mystery business

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

After months of courting by city officials, Sykes Enterprises Inc. announced Thursday it will build a customer-service center in Manhattan with more than $3 million in incentives from local taxpayers.

The company, based in Florida, will bring more than 400 jobs to Manhattan by this fall, when it will open a technical-support center in the 189-acre business park near Manhattan Regional Airport. The center will handle about 12,000 telephone calls each day from frustrated computer users needing technical support.

City, county and state representatives had worked for nearly a year to convince Sykes to open a center in Manhattan. The bargaining process included $6.73 million in economic incentives, $3.6 million of which came from the city.

The Collegian editorial board discusses this move by the city commission. See Page 4.

Of that total, $3.09 million comes from a half-cent Manhattan sales tax that funds economic development. The incentives will pay for roads and utilities at the building site and a five-year tax-relief package.

Thursday's announcement was made on behalf of Sykes by Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce officials, including Chamber Vice President Ann Harts, who read a statement from Sykes Chief Executive Officer John Sykes.

ICEMAN COMETH

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

VANILLA ICE PERFORMED THURSDAY NIGHT AT THE WAREHAM OPERA HOUSE. THE SET, WHICH WAS SCHEDULED TO BEGIN AT 10 P.M., STARTED AT 10:45.

Vanilla Ice brings funky music to town

More than 650 people assembled for one purpose Thursday night.

"Ice, Ice Baby."

Vanilla Ice, in the midst of his tour of college towns, played to a sold-out crowd of screaming fans at the Wareham Opera House. The Iceman, who broke onto the rap scene in 1992 with the first rap song ever to top the charts, hit the stage around 10:45 p.m. and played an almost hour-long set.

"I was so excited because I finally got to see my childhood sweetheart," said Jennifer Allman, freshman in early childhood education.

When asked why they came to the concert, both Andrew Walker, freshman undecided, and Ben Echalier, freshman in biology, said, "It's Vanilla Ice!"

That was all most people needed to know. Some came to relive years past and to say they saw Ice perform live. Paul Spears, junior in history and sociology, was even sporting an original Vanilla Ice shirt.

"My grandma bought it at some goodwill store and was going to mail it to some Russians, or something, and I told her that I would take it," Spears said.

K-State's Classy Cats started the show after 9 p.m. and performed a half-hour set. Opening up for Vanilla Ice was something new and different for the Classy

Senate mandates that its meetings start with recitation of Pledge of Allegiance

The 1997-98 Student Senate meetings began with the Pledge of Allegiance by the choice of the Student Senate chair.

The 1998-99 Senate meetings will begin with the Pledge of Allegiance by order of its standing rules.

Senate on Thursday approved changes to the standing rules that required the Pledge of Allegiance to be on the agenda. Previously, the Pledge of Allegiance was on the agenda, but it wasn't required to be.

The addition will not require those who feel uncomfortable saying the Pledge of Allegiance to say it.

However, some senators had a problem with the addition.

Faculty Representative to Senate Phil Anderson said any international students attending Senate might feel uncomfortable and some students might feel uncomfortable with the phrase "under God." He said the Pledge of Allegiance should not be mandatory for Senate meetings.

"I don't think it's necessary or appropriate for this body to have it," Anderson said.

Arts and Sciences Sen. Joey Bahr agreed with Anderson, but he said he didn't want anyone to think he was un-American.

"My problem is that we do have a lot of international students on this campus, and I don't want them to be offended," he said.

Student Senate Vice Chair Jake Worcester said he thought saying the Pledge of Allegiance was important and he wanted it to be mandatory for Senate meetings.

"We're not forcing anyone to say the Pledge of Allegiance," he said.

After the standing-rules amendments had passed with the Pledge of Allegiance included, Faculty Representative to Senate Bill Muir gave his support of the change.

"When I was in Germany, I stood as a matter of respect when they sang their anthem. I did the same in China and Canada," he said. "And I even sang along with 'God Save the Queen' in London.

"We can have respect for other countries without pledging our allegiance to them," Muir said.

Upcoming Indian performance to offer glimpse of classical dancing at K-State

Dancers from the Ellora Center for Performing Arts will perform classical Indian dances at 3 p.m. Sunday in Union Forum Hall.

The performance, sponsored by the Indian Student Association, will include three female dancers who will perform under the direction of Satyavani Iswara, a dance therapist from the Chicago-based center.

Indira Reddy, graduate student in grain science and industry and president of the Indian Student Association, said Iswara was raised and trained in classical dance in India, and has been in the United States for only a few years.

The women will perform classical dances from three southern states in India: Tamil Nadu, Kerala and Andhra Pradesh.

Reddy said there would be two styles of Indian dance that were new or uncommon to previous K-State performances.

"I'm absolutely sure that Mohini Attam has never been performed at Kansas State University before, and Kuchipudi is very, very rare at K-State because it's not easy to find Kuchipudi dancers," Reddy said.

A tradition that dates back more than 2,000 years, Indian dance is relevant to worship and is used as an expression of emotion. Its themes are based on mythology, legends and classical literature. There are two main forms: classical and folk.

Reddy said most of Manhattan's Indian community performs folk dance rather than classical dance.

"Some of our people here know classical, but most of us have not studied classical, so we just perform folk dances," she said.

Reddy said this is the first time the Indian Student Association has scheduled a dance performance that was not in conjunction with India Night last weekend.

"Most of special performances are more on the music side or the vocal side," she said.

DERBY, Kan. — Furor about the suspension of a 13-year-old who sketched a Confederate flag during math class won't change the Derby School District's rules.

The district's superintendent issued a news release Wednesday declaring that school administrators stand behind a policy forbidding racially divisive material, including Confederate Flags or articles.

"It is a good policy that has helped to temper racial tensions and has helped to dramatically curb racial incidents," Superintendent Dennis Shoemaker said.

T.J. West, a student at Derby Middle School, was suspended April 14 for three days after another student dared him to draw the flag and then took the drawing to a teacher.

Terry West, the boy's father, said his son didn't understand the racial implications.

Shoemaker said that T.J. West had a discipline record at school and that the record would provide a more accurate view of the situation, but that the boy's father had refused requests to release it.

Terry West said the district was trying to divert attention by pointing a finger at his son.

"I did not release T.J.'s discipline record because T.J.'s not on trial here," West said. "The policy of intimidation and racial harassment is what's controversial here, not T.J's past."

Suspension is the punishment mandated in the district's zero-tolerance policies regarding racial and sexual harassment, drugs, alcohol and weapons. The Confederate flag, unless used to teach history, is among the symbols included under the racial harassment policy.

Shoemaker said the suspension "was not for drawing a flag, but for defying a well-known school rule put in place to prevent the development of a disruptive, disorderly environment."

Derby has had problems with racial harassment in the past, he said.

A 350-member community task force was formed in 1995 to address racial tension after allegations that the Ku Klux Klan had been recruiting students at the high school.

The incident brought in the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights, which has been reviewing the district since 1995, Shoemaker said. He said the district had been found to be in compliance with all the department's guidelines.

Two other Derby students were suspended in February 1997 for wearing shirts with a bulldog wearing an inch-wide Confederate flag.

Entrepreneurs find guidance at center

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Eighty-two success stories line the wall of the Small Business Development Center. Some of the area businesses on the wall of fame include the Wildcat Creek Sports Center, It's Greek to Me and Little Apple Brewing Co..

Fred Rice, director of the Small Business Development Center, said the center is a place for entrepreneurs to find information, guidance and assistance.

"We are educators first, here at the center, but we help in many aspects of developing and maintaining a small business," Rice said.

Rice said most of the clients start at the same place when they start working with the center.

"The first thing most of our clients do is develop a business plan. We have a computerized cash-flow program to help project how well their business might do," he said.

> "YOU CAN'T RUN A BUSINESS THESE DAYS WITHOUT A COMPUTER. AND WITH THE COST OF THEM DOWN NOWADAYS, YOU ARE CRAZY NOT TO USE THEM."
> FRED RICE
> director, Small Business Development Center

Many people use the center's services to develop a business plan to present to their banks.

"Bankers won't lend you money without a financial plan. We don't write their plan, but we certainly do guide them through it," Rice said.

Some of the services offered by the center include free counseling, training, information and advocacy of the importance of small businesses to a community, Rice said.

"We also offer individual counseling and classes on many computerized accounting systems. You can't run a business these days without a computer. And with the cost of them down nowadays, you are crazy not to use one," he said.

John Curtis, a K-State alumnus, is one of the success stories on the wall. Curtis established Ag Tech Inc., an embryo-transfer supply business. Curtis said the center was a place for him to brainstorm a few ideas.

"It's a place to go express your ideas and then get ideas in return. The feedback helps when you are trying to establish and arrange your ideas," he said.

Established businesses also use the services of the center, Rice said.

"We answer many legal questions and provide training and information to people who are wanting to expand or improve their business," he said.

Last year, the center worked with 259 continuous clients. It also provided information to 605 walk-ins and had 694 people attend one of its 24 training sessions.

Rice said working with entrepreneurs is a rewarding job.

"They are wonderful, creative, motivated, inspirational. They see the value of investing their money and turning it into a viable and successful business."

JOHN CURTIS, K-STATE ALUMNUS, OPERATES AG TECH INC., AN EMBRYO-TRANSFER SERVICE IN MANHATTAN. AFTER 10 YEARS OF OPERATION, HE DECIDED TO GO TO THE SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT CENTER FOR GUIDANCE.

Development center helps catalog business get started

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

After deciding to change the scope of his business, John Curtis went to the Small Business Development Center for guidance.

Curtis, a K-State alumnus, had been operating his own embryo-transfer business for 10 years. After tiring of traveling to distant ranches and farms, he said he decided to change direction.

"I had put together a manual on the process of embryo transfer, and so I decided I could try and sell supplies along with the book," Curtis said.

With the help of the center, Curtis started his business, Ag Tech Inc. The catalog business provides products to veterinarians, farmers and ranchers around the country who are involved in embryo transfer and animal reproduction.

When in the development stages, Curtis said he got many different types of assistance.

"First off, they suggested an inexpensive business center to locate our new business," he said. "We discussed ways to market our product, and we worked through a couple of business plans. They directed me to what I needed to be thinking about."

Curtis said the center provided more than business information and guidance.

Ag Tech Inc. has operated in Manhattan since 1990. Curtis said he still goes to the center for advice, but not to the same extent as he did in the beginning of his business.

"I confer with them when I have an issue that I don't have answers for. I recently worked with them on information about surveying my customers," he said.

"They were certainly and still remain to be a good source for starting your own business."

Closed-door policy sets frightening precedent

A promising new business is coming to Manhattan. This is good news.

However, the closed-door antics of the City Commission seem unnecessary.

Sykes Enterprise Inc., headquartered in Florida, appears on paper to be a great opportunity to develop 400 new jobs and a larger tax base for the Manhattan area.

However, the secrecy involved in this plan is cause for some concern. Those involved in the courting of this business refused to name Sykes under the condition that the business would walk out if it were made public.

To entice the business, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce used an incentive package worth $6.73 million — including $3.6 million from the city's economic development fund. This incentive package involves some risk—more because discussion about the business was done behind closed doors.

Enticing Sykes to move to Manhattan is a risk. Spending three-fourths of the money generated in this fund is a risk.

The city clearly believes Sykes' decision to build in the Manhattan community is just the beginning.

We hope the business, which will build in the city's new business park outside of town by the Manhattan Municipal Airport, will hopefully attract other national businesses into the area.

This might be a situation where the ends justify the means, although taxpayers contributing to this fund have a right to know how the money is being spent.

In a close-knit community, and when tax revenue is spent to bring in a business (especially when the advantages seems obvious), full disclosure should be expected. This is a good opportunity for economic growth within the community.

This benefits package includes $3.09 million to be paid by the city's economic development fund. The four-year voter-supported one-half of one percent sales tax was created to generate funds for the city's economic development fund. City Manager Gary Greer and the community will need to determine if this method of generating funds will be reintroduced to the city commission.

Students here during any part of the past four years have contributed to the city's economic development fund and should also become part of the discussion. Student input and participation can be a significant part of future discussion if students choose to become educated and contribute to the equation.

Before the sales tax city development tax fund is considered for reinstatement, the Manhattan community should consider how much disclosure it expects during future city development deals.

THE PRICE OF LOYALTY

Football-ticket price hikes walk all over less well-heeled

April showers bring May flowers, as well as some sporting opportunities. For fans like myself, April can mean only one thing — that it's only four more months until football season! I know a lot of baseball fans would disagree with this, but I'd rather have my wisdom teeth pulled than watch a baseball game.

But watching the football games is on the verge of becoming a luxury item for many of us, with increases in student ticket prices and prioritized public seating. The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is taking advantage of the team's outstanding success to load up the coffers. It's only good business to do so. For Bob Cavello and Max Urick, the team's success has lightened the load they have to bear in raising money for the department.

However, Cavello and Urick might begin to burn bridges if they're not careful about how they use the attention the team gets. As miserly as I am with my money, I can't complain too much about the increase in price of student tickets. After all, you pay for quality, and the quality of the team over the past 10 years has gone from Salvation Army to Rodeo Drive. Not to mention the fact that with the referendum for the stadium expansion getting voted down, we all knew ticket prices were on the rise.

The department is raking in the dough while it can. It might be setting itself up for a long fall if it's not careful, though. History teaches us that college football teams rise and fall. Some manage to stay at the top longer than others do. I would love to see K-State in the top 10 for the rest of my life, but the odds are stacked against it. Most teams can only manage to run with the big dogs for five to 10 years before one thing or another causes them to falter.

This is where the danger in preference-based seating lies. It is repeatedly pointed out that many loyal fans who have supported the Wildcats for years can't afford to continue to attend games and bowls and contribute to the Ahearn Scholarship Fund. I realize the "Plan 2000" intends to find an "equitable" way to assign seats based on loyalty via long-term ticket holders and contributors to the fund. Money talks, though, and those who aren't contributing will get pushed aside.

VIEWPOINT

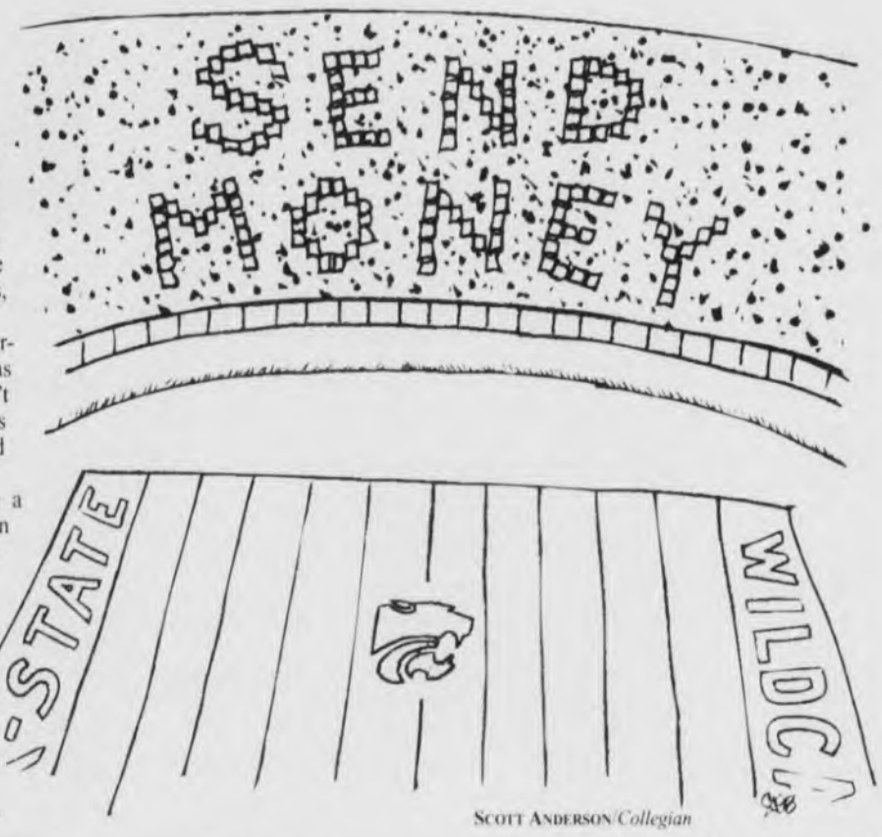
JASON RUCKER

Jason is a junior in kinesiology. You can him email at jasruk@ksu.edu.

When the team begins to post fewer W's in the future (no time soon) how will those people who got crowded out during the glory years feel? Will they jump at the chance to get tickets again once the new ticket holders with the money move on to the next team? Not likely.

These loyal fans will have their pride in the school crushed by being bumped. Their enthusiasm for the team will never be the same, if they come back at all. These same people, if they decide to contribute to the fund, will be the people missing from the traveling purple party at the bowl games to come.

When we get some 40,000 fans to attend a bowl game, I can promise you half of them made sacrifices to be there. For some, the bowl game is their family vacation. If these people are forced to donate to the fund the few thousand dollars they normally spend to get to the bowl game just to keep their season tickets, bowl attendance will drop.



These people are some of the loudest, over-the-top fans we have. The team needs them as much as they need the team. What we don't want is a bunch of stuffed shirts in the stands doing a golf clap after plays: "Jolly good throw Master Bishop. Good show old chap."

K-State graduate William Warner made a good point in the article that introduced "Plan 2000" to the campus. He said, "The policy will hurt the football team in the long run by placing a lower value in fan loyalty." Loyalty cannot be bought and sold.

He also pointed out that when it comes to the school seeking donations, there is only so much money out there. People might well begin contributing money to the Ahearn Scholarship Fund they would normally contribute to the Telefund, or other scholarships.

This topic is one for us all to consider, as I hope we will all one day be alumni and might want to attend the games.

With only the income of your new job, your student loans and bills to pay, will you be able to contribute the money it takes to be a fan?

Leukemia fund-raiser trifling compared with victims' battle

VIEWPOINT

BRANDI HERTIG

Brandi is a junior in mass communications. You can send e-mail to Brandi at blh0377@ksu.edu.

To find out how you can donate to the Leukemia Society of America, or if you're interested in joining Team in Training, call Brandi at 776-8481 or write to the eukemia Society of America, 555 N. Woodlawn, Building 1, Suite 113, Wichita, KS. 67208.

Two days before Linda McCartney died, a friend's mother also died of cancer.

Kirsten and I were good friends in high school, but we lost contact after she graduated. The last time I talked to her was last Labor Day. I didn't find out her mom even had cancer until the day before she died. I didn't find out she had died until it was too late to go to her funeral.

About the only thing I remember about Kirsten's mom is how she took me in one Thanksgiving, making sure to have something meatless for me. I remember I always felt welcome in their home.

I've always known that cancer is bad, but only in the way a 3-year-old knows touching a hot stove is bad. The only contact I've had with it has been via television — remember when Theo's friend had "The Big C" on "The Cosby Show?" How about those programs about Saint Jude's Children's Research Hospital with Marlo Thomas?

There has always been a nice thick piece of glass between me and this cancer thing. That is, until now.

In February, I decided to join the Leukemia Society of America's Team in Training. The team trains for a marathon — ours in San Diego — while raising money for the society. Honestly, my initial reasons for joining were not solely because I wanted to raise money to find a cure for leukemia — I just wanted something to pass the time while waiting for my hair to grow back after a recent shearing. Our group was assigned two leukemia patients for whom to run — and a goal of $2,700 to reach in order to go to the marathon in San Diego. And then there's all the running that had to be done.

By the way, the fund raising and running is as fun as it sounds. But there's no reason to whine, especially because I chose to participate. As corny as this sounds, people with cancer had their battle chosen for them while they were minding their own business. For me, this struggle will be over when I cross the finish line on June 21. People with cancer don't have it easy. Even if they go into remission, their finish line is still a distant blur.

However, all of the blisters, asthma attacks and truck loads of Epsom salts are beside the point. It's a nominal price to pay to be fortunate enough to be a healthy person. I'd venture to say that most people take being healthy (or even half-way, like most of us usually are) for granted. It's only when our bodies fail us when we realize how nice it is to be well. Or, only after we see the health of a loved one deteriorate do we begin to appreciate the benefits of being reasonably healthy.

Whatever the reasons my Team in Training teammates chose to join, there is one thing we all have in common — we are grateful to be able to participate on behalf of those who can't. We don't expect praise or recognition for ourselves, but rather praise for people with cancer and recognition for the cause.

I know it's easy to be blasé about raising money for diseases, especially when they're things that have never directly hit the scope of one's own life. The good news is that you don't have to wait for someone you hold dear to contract a disease in order to be sympathetic to its victims. The bad news is there are already many people — just in this area, mind you — who are struggling with some sort of life-threatening illness.

The silver lining here is you can get to know some of these people. Although not everyone with an illness would be willing to discuss it with a stranger, chances are you can find someone to strike up a relationship with.

To get started, you can contact the Kansas Chapter of the Leukemia Society of America to find out names of people in this area who have leukemia and are willing to talk about it.

The names you get will most likely be people participating as honored patients for Team in Training.

With just a little time and effort, you can see the people behind the diseases.

And you'll never know when you'll need an organization like the Leukemia Society of America yourself.

Hazing simply an idea whose time has passed

Editor,

Hazing. Yet another incident has been reported, this time in our own backyard. Even though Kappa Alpha Psi was not affiliated with K-State's Interfraternity Council, nor governed by its policies, one of the nation's best greek systems has been bruised by the actions of a few. When will the practice of hazing ever end?

I volunteer to serve as a fraternity adviser. The experience of mentoring students has many heartwarming rewards. Still, I shake my head in dismay that hazing pops up a generation after it was outlawed nationally. In today's society and campus culture, there is no need for these antiquated practices to teach human values. I speak from experience.

As a college freshman 30 years ago in New York, my classmates and I — men and women alike — submitted to freshman orientation. The eight-week program was organized, steeped in tradition and sanctioned by college officials as part of the freshman experience.

We wore freshman-class beanies woven in school colors and carried little black notebooks to gather students and faculty signatures. We met every weekday at noon to sing the college alma mater and receive instructions from freshman advisory board which consisted entirely of sophomore class members.

Was this hazing? You bet.

Once, I jaywalked across a grassy quadrangle to get to calculus class. A sophomore called me over, scolded me for stepping off the sidewalk and marked a demerit in my black book. Not to let me escape so easily, the sophomore and other upperclassmen who had gathered made me bury some blades of grass I had "killed" while walking on the lawn.

Was this hazing? Of course.

But, this was 1968. The women's dormitories had nightly curfews, lock up and even bed checks. If a woman and man were caught alone in a campus dorm room, they could pack suitcases and catch the next bus home. Those were the days of "in loco parentis," when universities acted like parents to their students.

I pledged a local fraternity during my freshman year, because national greek organizations did not exist at my college at that time. I lived in a chapter house, enjoyed all the benefits and served as an office each year. I freely admit that in those days I was hazed as a pledge, just like after graduation I was hazed by the U.S. Army during basic training. Remember, those were the days of the Vietnam War and there was a thing called the draft.

I buried blades of grass. I swallowed goldfish. I did push-ups until I thought my arms would break because my units old World War II barracks didn't pass the cleanliness inspection.

Was this hazing? You answer that.

What I'm leading you to realize is that society once accepted hazing as a rite of passage. It existed in many levels of society, as it is reported to exist today among urban gangs. You had to prove your value by proving your loyalty. And you proved that by submitting to hazing.

In the greek community, new rituals and ceremonies have emerged to teach human values based on respect. K-State is a national leader in creating a campus climate for these proactive steps. At the fraternity I advise at K-State, I attend these ceremonies. The rituals truly are beautiful and meaningful. We regularly have fathers participate in the ritual with their sons. It creates a father-son bond only they can appreciate. I expect other greek advisers and alumni mentors would say similar things today about their chapters' associate member programs.

It has taken dozens of freshman classes enrolling and graduating to arrive where we are today at eradicating this notion of hazing. Let us not let an isolated incident wipe out all the years of hard work. Positive change has occurred in greek living groups since I was a college freshman. An isolated black eye should not discourage students from enjoying the many outstanding programs and benefits fraternities and sororities offer.

In a decade of growing fear over gangs using theft and drive-by shootings as initiation rites, I'm glad to advise a group of college men who teach mutual respect to its associate members and who strive to achieve life's positive ideals. We need more of this.

Long die hazing.

Underage drinkers need education, not scolding

Editor,

This is in response to all the hype this past week about underage drinking.

I am not condoning underage drinking in any way. Sure it's a problem, but don't be hypocrites. Most of you drank before you turned 21.

The biggest problem I have with the drinking age in this great country is this: Politicians don't think twice about sending an 18-year-old perosn to war, but if I want to have a beer in this country I am breaking the law.

I have just as much right to comment on this topic as anyone.

I entered the service right out of high school at 17. Since then, I have been responsible enough to take a bullet for this country, but not responsible enough to have a drink in this country.

Nothing is going to stop underage drinking at K-State, so let's stop kidding ourselves and address a more important topic such as drinking and driving.

Quit trying to change something that's never going to change.

Perhaps we could spend more time researching drinking and driving and maybe start a shuttle service that students who have been drinking could take for an affordable price — like $1 or $2 for a safe ride home.

Furthermore, I admit many underage drinkers are less responsible than others, but we need to educate those underage drinkers about drinking and driving because, 21 or not, these kids are drinking.

Underage drinking will continue to be a problem and there is nothing Alcohol and Beverage Control or the police can do about it.

Personally, I think they are wasting their time.

I urge all drinkers, underage or not, to be responsible when consuming alcoholic beverages. Please think twice about drinking and driving.

You are not only putting your life in danger, but you are slo endangering the lives of innocent drivers.

Red Cross draws donors to CiCo

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

Myra Stewart, a part-time student at K-State, said she saw the heavens after she donated blood to the American Red Cross Thursday morning in Pottorf Hall at CiCo Park.

"He was talking, took the needle out, voices faded, my eyes fluttered, and I was out," Stewart said while lying down on a chaise lounge, a wet towel on her forehead, resting after donating blood. "It only lasted a couple seconds."

Stewart left the donor room in good condition, as did many others during the two-day blood drive that marked 50 years of blood service in the Central Plains Region of the American Red Cross.

Heidi Mitchell, chairwoman of Riley County blood drives, said although donor numbers decreased Thursday, the Red Cross came close to meeting its goal of collecting 150 pints on Wednesday.

"We collected 121 pints yesterday," Mitchell said, "which is really pretty good even though we didn't meet the goal of 150."

As people sat in the lounge chairs giving blood and others re-energized after donating by eating doughnuts and cookies, Mobile Unit Assistant Tony Blake organized pint-sized units of blood and arranged samples that will be tested for viruses in either Wichita, Kan., St. Louis or Tulsa, Okla.

Blake said donating blood could help save four lives, including the donor's.

"People don't realize this, but giving blood regularly can reduce the chance of having a heart attack by 50 percent," Blake said. "It also helps other people who need plasma, more red cells and platelets."

Giving blood reduces the amount of cholesterol in the body, Blake said, and rejuvenates many people.

"Everybody should do it. It really cleans out your whole system," he said.

On the average, people have between 10 and 12 pints of blood in their bodies, and only one pint is taken per donation. The whole procedure, including some basic health questions before donating and a 15-minute rest period afterward, takes approximately 35 minutes.

Unlike donating plasma, however, donating blood shouldn't be done every couple of weeks.

"It takes 56 days for the body to completely replace the blood that is taken, and then you can come in again," Blake said.

"It sounds silly, but you can compare it to an oil change. Your body produces new, fresh blood that replaces the old."

Payment plan could save U.S. $100 million, ambassador says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States could save $100 million a year in U.N. dues if Congress approves payment of a significant part of the arrears owed to the organization, U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson said Thursday.

He also said the United States could lose its vote in the United Nations by the end of the year unless the debt issue is resolved.

He said the administration remains open to any compromise that would separate U.N. funding from U.S. payments to family-planning organizations.

Last year the Senate approved an administration plan to pay more than $800 million in U.N. arrears. But the proposal was derailed in the House of Representatives when President Clinton refused to accept amendments to outlaw funds for abortion. Opponents of abortion funding say they plan similar action this year.

Richardson said passage of the request for payment of most of the $1.3 billion it owes the organization by the end of May would open the way for talks this summer on reducing the annual U.S. contribution from 25 percent of the U.N. budget to 22 percent.

"Failure to pass the necessary legislation in time will cause us to squander this unique opportunity, and we will be unable to reopen the scales of assessment (talks) until the fall of 2000," Richardson said.

The full committee has approved $505 million for payment of U.S. arrears, but he said the administration needed the $921 million in its initial request.

▶ K-STATE STUDENTS DONATE TIME, EFFORT TO COMMUNITY DURING LOCAL SERVICE WEEK.

The Manhattan Emergency Shelter relies heavily on volunteer work from the local community. K-State students helped volunteer at the shelter Thursday.

Students volunteered their time at the shelter for the fourth day of Community Service Week, a national week dedicated to serving others.

Junell Norris, executive director of the shelter, said the organization is in constant need of volunteers.

"We only have nine paid staff members," she said. "Last year we had 228 volunteers who completed approximately 6,000 hours of volunteer work."

Norris said that college students play an important role at the shelter.

"The majority of our volunteers are college students," she said. "We are willing to work around their tests and their schedules."

The K-State women's basketball team also participated in Thursday's service project by volunteering its time to do odd jobs at the shelter.

"We got a call about two weeks ago," Sue Serafini, assistant coach, said. "We were asked if we would like to have an opportunity to come out and help in the community, and we jumped at the chance."

COALSON

Serafini said that the team was excited to be involved in Community Service Week.

"We really love to help volunteer or raise money whenever we have the opportunity," she said.

"It's the very philosophy and belief system of the program. The players love doing it."

While at the shelter, the team had a list of jobs that needed to be done. Some of the tasks included cleaning out the basement of the Sunflower House, moving sheet rock and plywood, touching up the interior woodwork with new paint, and moving boxes of files across the street to a storage shed.

Jenny Coalson, junior in mathematics education and member of the team, said she enjoyed helping.

"I like to meet people in the community," she said.

"That's why I like doing things like this."

Split personality highlights track team's weekend plans

The K-State track team will be splitting forces today and Saturday, sending athletes to three different meets.

The Wildcat middle distance and distance runners, as well as hammer thrower Renetta Seiler, will compete in the Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa. K-State sprinters, multi-event athletes and high jumpers will compete at the Sooner Outdoor Invitational in Norman, Okla. The throwers will be at the University of Missouri-Kansas City Invitational.

"Those are just the locations that are the best for those events," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said.

At the Drake Relays, the K-State men will run the 3,200-meter relay and the distance-medley relay. The 3,200-meter relay team will consist of Istvan Nagy, Scott Galas, Kevin Lewis and Matt Davis. Brandon Jessop, along with Nagy, Galas and Davis, will be on the distance-medley relay team.

Nagy and Galas are coming off last week's good performances at the Mount SAC Relays. Nagy ran a 1:50.12, and Galas ran a 1:51.95, in the Mount SAC University Division 800 meters.

"Istvan ran OK. That was his season-best time, but I think he can run a couple of seconds faster," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said the Wildcats are entering the Drake Relays with the intention of running personal records.

"Hopefully, the competition will be there so we can get a lot of PRs," Rovelto said. "This group of kids is going to the meet with the mindset that they're going to run fast."

At the Sooner Outdoor, Wildcat multi-event athlete Attila Zsivoczky, who is No. 2 in the nation in the decathlon with a score of 7,872 points, will compete in all throwing events and the 110-meter hurdles.

High jumpers Charles Burney and Nathan Leeper, who both have a season best jump of 7-4 1/2, will attempt to advance in the national rankings in the outdoor.

"There's only one guy in the country who has jumped higher, and there's five or six guys who have jumped the same height," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said sprinters Darcy Morris and Rachel Woods have been running well in the 400 meters. Morris ran a personal-record 55.12 in last week's Arkansas Tyson Invitational.

"Their best event is the 400," Rovelto said. "They have both improved enormously, and I'm anxious to see what they're going to do in the next couple of weeks."

The Wildcats will feature their throwers, except Seiler, at the UMKC Invitational.

Anna Whitham will enter the invitational coming off an NCAA provisional qualifying mark of 180 feet in the hammer.

Problems apparently force Hatchell to leave Big 12 post

DALLAS — Big 12 Commissioner Steve Hatchell said he plans to leave the conference he helped form three years ago shortly after the league's spring meetings.

A source close to the situation told The Associated Press that Hatchell was being pressured to leave because of management and staff problems at Big 12 headquarters.

"I don't know that I'm a particularly easy person to work for," he said, adding some employees in the Dallas office are probably justified in their beliefs he was tough on them.

Big 12 Chairman Ray Bowen denied Hatchell is being forced out.

"It is certainly not a fact that this board is trying to push him out," Bowen said.

"He is the commissioner, and he of his own free will has decided to look at other opportunities."

Hatchell said he is being considered for a job with the Salt Lake City Olympic Organizing Committee, but would not discuss other possibilities.

Among those being mentioned as his possible replacement at the Big 12 are two athletics directors: Joe Castiglione at Missouri and Bob Frederick at Kansas.

Frederick, a former chairman of the NCAA basketball tournament selection committee, finished as a runner-up to Hatchell when Big 12 presidents chose him as the league's first commissioner.

Hatchell was the SWC commissioner at the time.

Hatchell told radio station KLIF-AM the likely target date for his departure from the Big 12 would be the beginning of June or July.

Bowen, the Texas A&M president, said no one in the league office had complained specifically to him about Hatchell's conduct.

"It's a high-stress, high-pressure job," Bowen said during a conference call. "I don't hear anybody whining about that, but they'll tell you they are working themselves to death."

Bowen said Hatchell told the league last month he was looking for other jobs. Hatchell said he wants the transition to a new commissioner to go as smoothly as possible.

K-State die-hard creates Web page to promote Michael Bishop for Heisman Trophy

The Heisman Trophy.

It's college football's most prestigious award, given annually to the best player in the game.

Prerequisites for winning the trophy include playing on a national championship-caliber team, putting up mammoth numbers and receiving tons of publicity.

With more than four months until the kickoff, it's a little early for the hype to start. However, K-State quarterback Michael Bishop has been mentioned as a candidate from coast to coast for nearly six months, longer than it's been since last year's winner, Michigan cornerback Charles Woodson, was announced.

It's no mystery that winning the award requires a big publicity drive, but Coach Bill Snyder has said publicly K-State won't take part in any such campaign, and that he'll let Bishop try to win it on the field.

But that's not good enough for one Cats fan, 25-year-old Brian Gates of Beloit, Kan. Gates, a 1994 K-State graduate, unofficially started the Bishop for Heisman campaign about two weeks ago when he produced a World Wide Web page promoting No. 7's candidacy.

The site has photos of Bishop, notes about his previous college play and quotes about him from other people around college football. Gates is getting the word out about the quarterback, but he doesn't think it will make a difference in the race.

Water ski squad to challenge KU

▶ WILDCATS TO MEET INTRASTATE RIVALS AFTER CAPTURING WILDCAT INVITATIONAL.

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

As the weather warms, people are ready to don their swimsuits and go out to the lakes.

The KSU Water Ski team is already one step ahead.

Last weekend, the water ski team competed in its first tournament of the season, the Wildcat Invitational in Emporia. The team won its own tournament for the third year in a row.

This weekend, the team will go to KU to compete.

Dustin Manhart, the team's vice president, said the tournaments usually consist of three events — slalom, trick and jump.

"All the tournaments will be three-eventers, but not everybody will compete in all three," he said.

Team President Jaime Arb said the team will continue to compete on an individual basis throughout the summer. When school resumes in the fall, it will compete as a team again.

Arb said there are usually two or three tournaments before the regional tournament in September.

"The last weekend in September is our big tournament," she said.

"It's what we work on all year."

Last year, the team took fourth overall at the regional tournament and the women placed first. Nineteen teams competed.

Arb said the tournament is really competitive with teams there from the University of Michigan, Michigan State, Purdue and KU.

"We've done really well," she said. "You have to be in the top two teams to go to nationals, so we're hoping next year we get to go to nationals."

Manhart said nationals are a realistic goal.

"Our team's got a lot of spirit. That's why I think we have a good chance of going to nationals," he said.

The small team, started by Skip Wefald, President Jon Wefald's son, in the mid-1980s, has grown to a 30-member team that now sends some of its members to ski school.

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State tennis team has earned the right to take another shot at intrastate rival Kansas today in the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

The No. 7 Wildcats advanced on Thursday with an opening-round 5-1 dismantling of the No. 10 Oklahoma State Cowgirls in Lincoln, Neb.

Once again, the Cats were led by Yana Dorodnova at No. 1 singles as she overcame a tough first set to win 7-6 (7-2), 6-2.

Dinah Watson closed the meet for the Cats with her 6-1, 6-1 win at No. 6 singles, giving the team the five points needed to win the meet.

Coach Steve Bietau made some changes to his singles lineup for the tournament.

He advanced Martina Pospisilova to the No. 2 spot and dropped Anna Pampoulova to the No. 3 position.

Pampoulova responded with a straight-set win, 6-4, 7-6 (10-8). However, Pospisilova was not as fortunate in her move up the roster. She suffered the Cats' only defeat of the day as she was beaten 6-2, 6-4.

The convincing win over Oklahoma State sets up a rematch of the April Fool's Day meet, in which Kansas beat the Cats 8-1 in Manhattan.

The Cats said they believe the 8-1 score was not indicative of how close the meet was.

Several matches were fought that could have gone either way in both singles and doubles. The Cats said they know that if they can turn the tide on some of those close matches, they could upset the Jayhawks.

DINAH WATSON RETURNS A HIT AGAINST A BAYLOR OPPONENT AT CHESTER E. PETERS RECREATION COMPLEX ON APRIL 13.

"Even though we lost 8-1, I think that now we have a chance because we lost all the really close matches," Pampoulova said.

"The score would have been quite different after the singles if we could have won some of those matches," she said.

During the April 1 matchup, Watson was forced to move up to No. 5 because senior Lena Piliptchak was injured. The move didn't hurt the Cats, because Watson posted the lone victory for the team.

"Lena didn't play last time," Dorodnova said. "With her back this time, that should give us an edge at numbers 5 and 6."

Watson said she agreed Piliptchak's return to the lineup should help the Cats in their chances of upsetting the No. 2-seeded Jayhawks.

"I'm a little bit optimistic," Watson said. "I won my match at No. 5, and Lena will be playing, so hopefully, that will be two matches we have a good chance in."

Arrival of NHL Playoffs signals real beginning of hockey season

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

Dan is a senior in computer science. You can send e-mail to Dan to dmerker@ksu.edu.

This is the time of year I always wait for.

Wednesday night, the NHL Playoffs started. When the playoffs start, the face of the league changes. As much as it pains me to say, perhaps only the regular season of the NBA is more pointless than that of the NHL, where 16 of 26 teams make the playoffs. Before recent expansion, it was worse; five of 21 teams failed to make the playoffs as recently as seven years ago.

Much of the season is spent going through the motions, especially for the teams that are unlikely to miss the playoffs. As proof, in the '90s only one of the teams that won the President's Trophy, which goes to the regular season champion, has gone on to win the Stanley Cup — the 1994 New York Rangers.

Maybe teams expend too much energy trying to get home-ice advantage for the playoffs. Last year was a perfect example. The Detroit Red Wings had finished atop the Western Conference in 1994, 1995 and 1996, but each year failed to win the Stanley Cup. My personal favorite was in '94, when they lost in the first round to the San Jose Sharks in probably the biggest upset in Stanley Cup Playoff history.

Last season, they stepped back the intensity and didn't even win their division. But in June, they hoisted the Stanley Cup over their collective heads.

This phenomenon, where teams change face and play a much more intense and higher level of hockey, is known in hockey circles as "playoff hockey." This might seem like an obvious term, but it stands for the brand of play, not the time of year in which it is played. The vicious Detroit/Colorado series the past few years has been referred to as "playoff hockey."

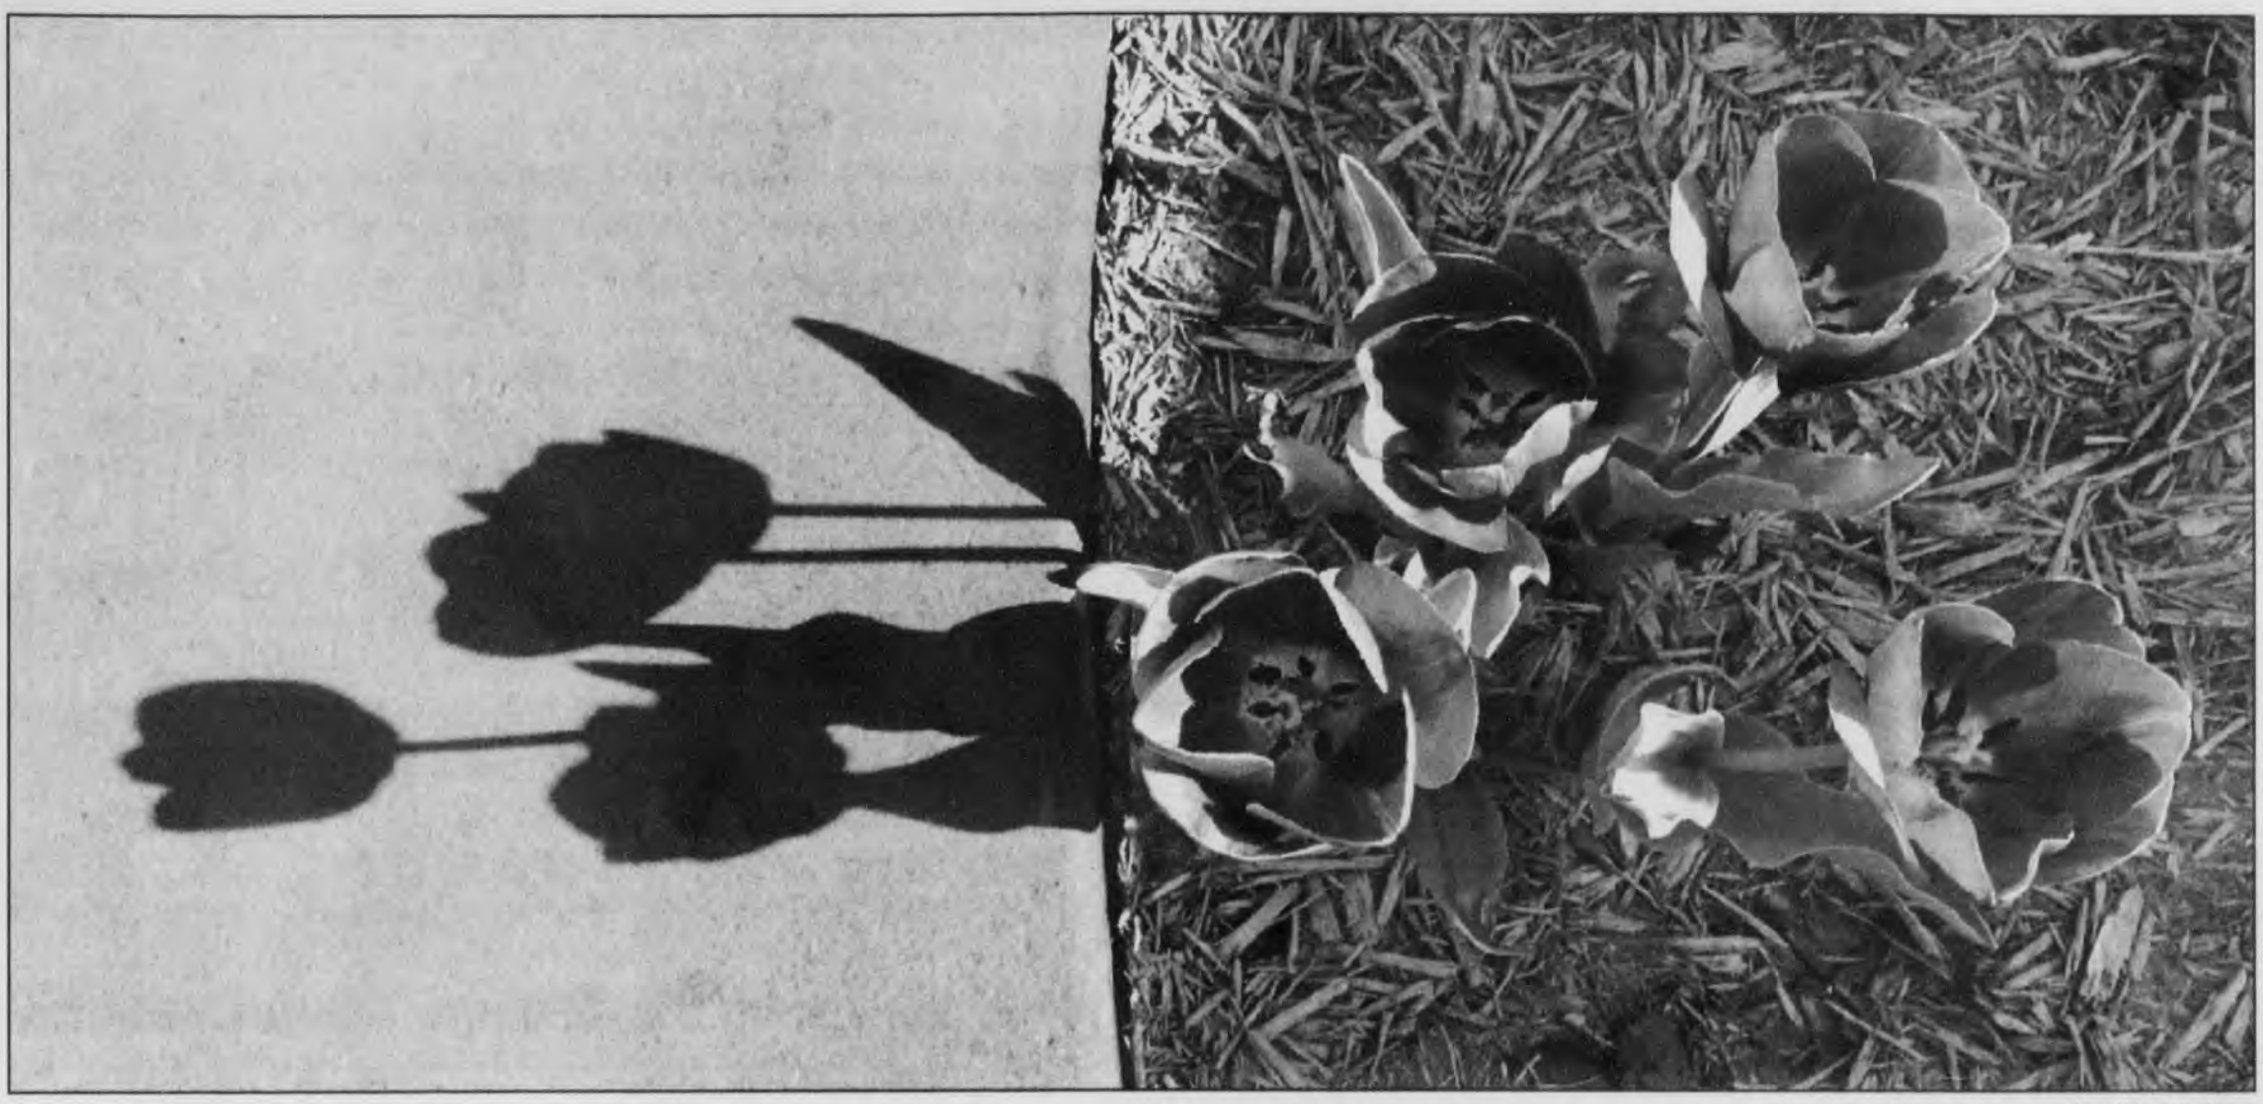
It's a far superior brand of play to the regular variety, which is already the best sport in the world.

In baseball, football and basketball, everybody talks about getting "the ring." When a hockey player looks at his goal, it is to have his name on the Stanley Cup, and it's a dream that's hard to verbalize. The oldest trophy in team sports at 105 and counting, there is only one Stanley Cup. When a team wins, all its players' and coaches' names are engraved on the cup for prosterity.

It is not like the World Series Trophy; you will not see 23 of them on display at the Molson Centre to celebrate all the Montreal Canadiens' victories. When a player reaches his life's goal of hoisting the Cup over his head, it is the same cup Maurice Richard, Bobby Orr, Mario Lemieux and Wayne Gretzky lifted in their days, and his name will forever be with theirs, even if he is just a seventh defenseman.

Nothing can match the emotion of winning the cup, except maybe an Olympic gold medal. No Vince Lombardi Trophy will give a sight like in 1995 when the New Jersey Devils won the cup. With Game 4 in hand with and less than five minutes left, Mike Peluso, one of the toughest guys in the league, was sobbing like a baby with elation, realizing he finally would win the cup.

Nothing else can make a big, tough guy with a bad haircut and half a mouthful of teeth emote quite like that. No other sport has quite the euphoria of when the Stanley Cup is handed out. No feeling possibly can replace that of when Orr and Uwe Krupp scored overtime goals to end the series and win the cup, and it could be seen on their faces.



Watching some of the great goals in NHL Playoff history is proof. These grown men will skate down the ice and slide on their bellies like children on a Slip-n-Slide after scoring an important goal. No moment in sports can match overtime of the playoffs, when a goal by either team can end the game at any moment.

It's even better when it's Game 7 of a series, when a goal decides whether your season will continue or you will go home, in an instant. Ray Whitney found out what it was like to win a series when his 1995 goal put the Sharks in the second round and ended the Calgary Flames' season.

The excitement and exhaustion of multiple overtime games, like in 1996 when Petr Nedved's goal ended a game between Pittsburgh and Washington that nearly had to go to five overtime periods to decide a winner, at nearly 2 a.m. local time, is unmatched. In a sport where a 75-second shift is an eternity, imagine the pure emotion upon which the game must be played after it is 140 minutes old.

The NHL Playoffs are the most fabulous event in all of sports, even though they last two months. It's just a shame more people don't follow them and discover the greatness of "the coolest game on earth."

Talk show accused of faking fist fights

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — All of a sudden, it's Jerry Springer who's taking the hits, not the guests on his fists-flying talk show.

Rolling Stone magazine and a TV entertainment show are reporting that the fights are about as real as a professional wrestling match, a charge the show denies.

And the NBC station that brought Springer to the big leagues has scraped the show off the bottom of its corporate shoes amid rising criticism that it has degenerated into a pornographic slugfest.

But Springer has a history of profiting from sleaze. And as media watchers doubted that his top-rated daytime talk show will suffer from the allegations, Chicagoans braced for a double dose of "The Jerry Springer Show" on a new station.

"Nobody ever lost any money underestimating people's taste," said Christopher Sterling, a George Washington University media scholar.

The show is like wrestling, Sterling said.

"The whole thing is a put-up job."

On Thursday, Chicago's WFLD-TV, owned by the Fox Broadcasting Co., quickly snatched up the syndicated show in a multiyear deal that will air it not once, but twice daily.

A day earlier, WMAQ-TV said it was ending its contract with Springer, whose profile the NBC station tried to raise a year earlier in a brief but disastrous stint as a news commentator.

The WMAQ announcement came just hours before the syndicated show "Extra" was scheduled to air a report saying many of Springer's fights are staged and guests are coached. Today, Rolling Stone hits the newsstands with similar allegations.

Show spokesman Jim Benson denied the allegations and said the show has strict production guidelines and policies.

But Springer, who generally detaches himself from the show's preparations, said he tended to think the allegations were correct.

"If they are right, then obviously the producers did something totally wrong, against our policy, and we'll deal with it," he said at a New York speaking engagement Thursday.

Springer said people are told not to fight, but that they are told to perform and, if it's a contentious issue, to get in someone's face.

"To be on our show, you have to be outrageous, or your situation has to be outrageous," he said.

Suzanne Muir, a Canadian restaurant owner who helped staged a high-profile hoax on the Springer show three years ago, said reports of staged shows are hardly shocking and she doubted that viewers care.

"You can tell who his audience is by who he's playing to," she said. "These people have just come from a fresh cockfight or a tractor pull."

The Springer show, which featured such topics as "I Strip With My Family," had been broadcast in Chicago daily from WMAQ's downtown studios. It will continue to be produced there according to the new deal with WFLD-TV.

Larry Wert, WMAQ's new president and general manager, said only that he determined the show did not fit with his station's goals of making "the strongest connection with the community."

About 75 protesters outside the NBC Tower shifted gears after the changeover and marched to WFLD studios a few blocks away, vowing to shame Fox tycoon Rupert Murdoch for reviving Springer's show in Chicago.

"We want you to understand, Mr. Murdoch, you are not crafty or cunning. You are sick. And we're coming after you," said the Rev. Michael Pfleger, who's leading a Springer boycott.

Stacey Marks-Bronner, WFLD's vice president and general manager, said in a statement late Thursday that the station had licensed the show "based on Studios USA senior officials' assurances of its complete authenticity and eradication of any violent elements."

Henry Travis, a 28-year-old computer worker who watched the protesters, didn't seem fazed by hearing the show might be faked.

"It would actually be somewhat reassuring," Travis said, "because if you see 'I'm sleeping with my cousin and my other cousin' or 'My brother is the father of my baby,' it's almost reassuring to find out ... it's not really happening."

location for us due to its demographic profile and population," Sykes said in the statement. "Manhattan, as with other communities where our domestic call centers are located, allowed us to receive assistance consistent with those received in other American communities."

The company, formerly code-named "Project Tech," had threatened to back out of negotiations if its name had been made public.

Former Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead said Sykes' decision to build in Manhattan is exactly why economic development measures such as the half-cent sales tax were implemented.

"Four years ago, this community committed to its future through a self-assessment of a half-cent sales tax to be invested in economic development activities," Snead said. "We set goals of diversification while building on our strengths, and this partnership with Sykes is the most significant culmination of all of that effort."

Harts said ground should be broken on the 42,000-square-foot facility next month, and that Sykes is projected to add $10 to $12 million to the Manhattan economy. The call center will be open 24 hour a day to take calls from nearly 500 technology firms that it serves with technical support.

City officials said they're excited the Sykes firm will be the first to develop in the newly zoned business park development, which is meant to entice companies to develop in the Manhattan area. But the $3.09 million incentive from Manhattan's economic development fund leaves just more than $1 million to offer other businesses.

City Manager Gary Greer said there is money left for other businesses, but the main source of money for the fund, the half-cent sales tax, is scheduled to end this year unless the Manhattan City Commission votes to continue it.

"We have over $1 million that is uncommitted at this point in time from our funding, and that's a very conservative estimate," Greer said. "Our sales tax does sunset at the end of the year, and we're hoping that we understand that economic development isn't something that goes away. We've got to continue these efforts."

When asked if city officials would recommend continuing the sales tax, Greer said city officials don't run the city — citizens do. He said city staff members will wait for input from Manhattan residents and city commissioners and will follow whatever policy is set.

"Personally, from the city's standpoint, we let the community tell us what to do so we're anticipating the community having a dialogue and finding out what they want to do," Greer said. "Once they do, they'll set the policy and we'll follow that policy."

Officials at the announcement said a tax-incentive package that was approved by Manhattan's economic development fund committee on April 1 and by the city commission on April 2 shows the city's creativity.

Because the company is service-oriented, state guidelines prohibit it from receiving tax abatements.

Chamber President Dan Colantone said he hopes other businesses will develop in the park because of Sykes' move.

"This is going to be that anchor tenant that's going to launch that opportunity for the business park," Colantone said.

Cats, Janae Jardine, sophomore in pre-health professions, said. Jardine said the only thing that might even come close would be nationals.

"It was a lot of fun. The show was more crowd-involved than the normal games we perform at. We played more of the music we like to dance to," Jardine said.

Ice made sure the crowd was involved by asking it to repeat the phrases that made him famous. Some of these catch phrases included "Play that funky music, white boy," "Stop this train. I wanna get off" and "Ice, Ice Baby."

"The concert was OK, but he kept saying the same things over and over again," said Allyson Kirk, freshman in human resource management.

Ice started off with "Check It Out" and then asked if people in Manhattan smoked marijuana. The crowd cheered as Ice began his tribute to the drug with the song "Roll 'Em Up."

Ice also played classics such as "Mind Blowin'," the title track to his 1994 release; the beatbox "Havin' a Roni;" and "Ice, Ice Baby." After the crowd chanted "Ice," Ice returned to play three more songs, including some new material.

Ice said his new album "Hard to Swallow" will be in stores sometime next month.

Jeff Fellows, owner and manager of KJ's Bar & Dance Club and organizer of the concert, said Ice was happy with the show and that the sound quality was the best so far on his tour.

Fellows said the great response from the crowd was a good indication of shows to come. Before this concert, Fellows said he would begin to pursue more acts from the '80s if the Ice show went over well.

Thursday night, fashion history was showcased at K-State.

The Calvin Klein Collection Fashion Event, sponsored by the Jones Store Co. and produced by the Apparel and Textiles Promotions class, was Thursday night at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. The show, which has been in the making since January, was composed of 35 pieces from Calvin Klein's collection. The pieces were selected from the famous fashion designer's collection from 1985 to the present.

K-State is only one of three universities nationwide to have received pieces from Klein's collection. The company received numerous proposals from universities across the nation and recently granted K-State's Department of Apparel, Textiles and Interior Design the 35 pieces that were presented at Thursday's show. The models in the show were K-State students.

Marla Day, instructor of the Apparel and Textiles Promotions class, said she thought the event would promote the department.

"These pieces were given to the universities with the top apparel and design departments," Day said.

"So this is a fabulous opportunity for us."

The pieces now belong to the department's Historical Costume Collection, which preserves clothing and textile items of historical and artistic value.

Christy Ade, junior in apparel and textile marketing and student in Day's class, said she agreed with Day.

"This is a great honor for the department," she said.

Keylee Sanders, junior in apparel and textile marketing, was the coordinator of the event. She said an event such as a fashion show requires assistance from more than just the Department of Apparel, Textiles and Interior Design. She also had the chance to work with Day's class, and her own business, Keylee Sue Sanders Inc., was involved as well.

"It's a campus event," she said. "It isn't just one department."

Ratana Tshibanda, fashion and special promotions director for the Jones Store Co., said her company was eager to help out with the event, and that she equally was eager to work with the Apparel and Textiles Promotions class.

"This is something that is unique in this area," she said.

"The Jones Store is looking forward to working with this class in the future."

Now that the fashion show is over, Day said, the pieces belong to the department. The pieces will be stored on the third floor of Justin Hall, with the rest of the Historical Costume Collection.

The pieces will be kept in a room where the temperature and light are controlled to better preserve them. The pieces also will be used as visual aids in the Apparel and Textile Promotions class.

School to salute its golden graduates

LORY STONE

Margaret Pixley James and Marjorie Jane Knostman Schowengerdt lounged comfortably in the K-State Student Union on Thursday sharing memories and laughter of their days as students.

The two returned to K-State as part of their class reunion. The three-day reunion for 1948 graduates began on Wednesday. Their reunion marks their entry into the Golden K Club, a reunion club that includes K-Staters who graduated before 1948.

James and Schowengerdt, both graduated in home economics, said they had fond memories of their years at K-State.

"We were able to participate in everything," Schowengerdt said. "Our class started with only 2,000 students, but by the time we graduated four years later, our class had grown to 7,000 or 8,000."

Both James and Schowengerdt said they agreed walking was essential when they were students.

"Most didn't have cars. Our fellas didn't have cars to take us places either. We had to walk places, like to the Wareham to see a show," James said.

"And we didn't fear walking at night," Schowengerdt said.

"It was quite a different experience. We didn't need all that exercise stuff because we walked everywhere," James said.

James said going to K-State was more personal during her time here.

"Professors knew you. You weren't a number," James said. "My kids are nothing but numbers and that's too bad. "When I graduated, the president took my hand and said, 'Good work Margaret.'"

Despite 50 years, some things don't change, though.

James said the tours have made evident the durability of her feet.

"I can still walk the campus. My kids have to tell me to slow down," James, from Liberty, Mo., said. "We had to laugh on our way to dinner because people kept offering us the elevators."

Ray dies, takes question of guilt to his grave

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — James Earl Ray, the petty criminal who confessed to assassinating Martin Luther King Jr., then recanted and spent decades seeking a trial, died Thursday morning. He was 70.

Ray, who was serving a 99-year prison sentence for the April 4, 1968, slaying, died of kidney failure and complications from liver disease, said his brother, Jerry Ray. He had been hospitalized repeatedly since late 1996.

By pleading guilty in March 1969, Ray avoided the possibility of a conviction at trial and a death sentence. He then argued for years that he was coerced into making the plea.

His attempt to get a trial drew an unlikely coalition that included his family as well as King's family and other civil rights leaders who said they believe d King was the victim of a murder conspiracy, not a lone man.

"America will never have the benefit of Mr. Ray's trial, which would have produced new revelations about the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr., as well as establish the facts concerning Mr. Ray's innocence," Coretta Scott King, the slain civil rights leader's wife, said shortly after Ray's death.

Wayne Chastain, one of Ray's lawyers, said he agreed: "We still think he's innocent. ... History will have to write the final verdict."

William Gibbons, the lead state prosecutor in Memphis, said Ray's legal petitions aimed at getting his guilty plea thrown out are now over.

"About the only thing I can say is I believe the history books will accurately record that James Earl Ray was the killer of Dr. King," Gibbons said.

Hosea Williams, a former King lieutenant and Southern Christian Leadership Conference executive director, said he thought the federal government was behind King's assassination and orchestrated Ray's guilty plea to keep the truth from coming out.

"I have as great a feeling for Ray as I have for King," Williams said Thursday in Atlanta. "Both deaths were in vain, a useless and cruel act of our federal government."

Springfest '98, scheduled for May 9 from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., is expected to be a concert to offer music lovers of all types something to celebrate.

"We wanted to sponsor something like this to put DB92 on the map," said Len Potillo, station manager of KSDB-FM 91.9.

"Manhattan has been struggling with its local music scene for quite some time. There are only a few places were bands can play, so most of them are looking for gigs in Lawrence and Kansas City," Potillo said. "We wanted to give people in Manhattan something really fun to do for a change."

Because campus offers many facilities that lend themselves to concerts, Potillo said the station decided to have the event on campus and chose Memorial Stadium as the ideal location.

"Bramlage and the new football stadium were just too expensive. We also like the idea of nostalgia that Memorial offered. We get a great feeling of springtime and a great atmosphere," Potillo said.

Potillo said the day will offer a wide variety of musical genres.

"The bill ranges from alternative to pop to a sort of new-age folk to music that is really just about good times," he said.

"Tone Loc's album is being rereleased on April 28, so people will be able to pick that up before the concert if they don't already have it," Potillo said.

Springfest does fall around the same time as two other festivals, the Jayhawk Music Festival and the Sunflower Music Festival, but Potillo said he doesn't expect this to hurt the turnout here.

"We should have a really good turnout from this area, and I expect a good draw from Lawrence. We have two Lawrence bands on our bill, Danger Bob and Paw. Paw sold out the Wareham when they played here and I believe also Memorial Hall, so they have a really big following," Potillo said.

The concert also will bring in acts one may not catch any place else.

"We're bringing the Posies, a classic Seattle old-school alternative band. They had broken up but are getting together to play this show, so they may not be together after our gig," Potillo said.

Tickets can be purchased for $12 in advance and $15 the day of the show. Backstage passes also are available.

"Some people showed an interest in buying backstage passes, so we're making around 30 of them available for $50 a piece. Once they're sold, they're gone," Potillo said.

Advance tickets are available at the K-State Union Bookstore, Streetside Records, Dillons and Manhattan Town Center.

Concert attendees are allowed to bring lawn chairs and coolers that contain no more than a six-pack. Water and other beverages are allowed, but no alcohol.

"People don't have to stay the whole time. We will we giving out armbands, so people can come and go as they like. We'll have vendors selling food and drinks and T-shirts and CDs, but if they want to go home to eat and come back, they can," Potillo said.

Onion offers alternative to standard news on Web

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

According to a K-State housing department report, a three-week study by freshmen Chad Durham and Kurt Beem has proven that posters of scantily clad women fail to produce the real thing.

That is, of course, if you believe the story printed in the Wisconsin-based newspaper, The Onion.

The Onion is a farcical newspaper published in Madison, Wis., with more than 4,000 subscriptions across the country, focusing in the Midwest. It is published 44 weeks of the year, taking breaks in concurrence with the schedule of the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

"The Onion was first published in the fall of 1988. We went online in May of 1996," Scott Dikkers, editor of The Onion, said. "We've never had any official connection to the University of Wisconsin. The only connection we have to the UW is that the university community was our main audience when we started."

The paper has fake news stories, such as "Microsoft patents one and zeros," as well as phony editorials, infographics and advertisements.

▶ Check it out
To see The Onion for yourself point your World Wide Web browser to www.theonion.com.

Because of the sensitive — and sometimes adult — nature of the material, Dikkers said the staff has to be careful to avoid libel and offensive subject matter. The paper has a disclaimer that it is not for readers younger than 18.

"If we thought a story was in bad taste, we wouldn't run it," Dikkers said. "Bad taste to us is something we're not comfortable running. There's no guidebook or anything. We take it on a story-by-story basis."

Despite headlines like "Fed chief announces lowering of interest in fed chief's wife" and "Pope Admits: 'God ain't said shit to me,'" Dikkers said the staff only has only been threatened with a lawsuit once.

"We're not supposed to talk about it. Someone very famous didn't like a story we ran about her," he said. "What happened is our genius lawyer got us out of it by just calling up this big star's highfalutin' Beverly Hills lawyer and having a little talk. She dropped the matter."

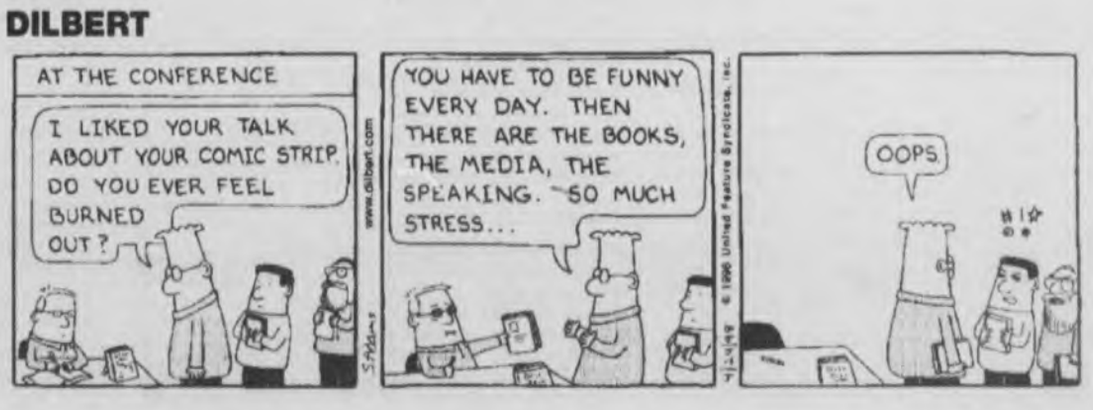
Dikkers said the biggest problem is not people upset because the stories are made up, but people who believe they are real.

He related one story of a couple who wrote in about a story titled "Chinese woman gives birth to septuplets: Has one week to choose."

"They went off about 'What kinds of Draconian policies must China enact before the U.S. realizes there are serious human rights abuses continuing in that nation?'," he said. "Here were people who clearly kept up with current events, were well-educated, but could not step back and look at the satirical context of what they were reading."

All stories and quotes are made up by Onion writers and editors, most of whom have newspaper experience, although not necessarily news-writing experience. Several staff members, including Dikkers himself, started as cartoonists.

Dikkers said this type of staff allows for a relaxed atmosphere in the newsroom.



"Most staff writers trail in by 10 or 11 a.m. on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, which are meeting days. The other days they often don't come in at all, or very late," he said.

But if you have ideas for possible stories, Dikkers said to keep them.

"Our staff comes up with the ideas out of their own heads. We don't accept unsolicited submissions," he said.

"First of all, we can't for legal reasons. Second of all, we get enough unfunny ideas from our own staff, why would we need to get them from outsiders?"

Bill to include many tax breaks

▶TAX RELIEF TO LOWER BILLS FOR MANY KANSANS, INCLUDING HOMEOWNERS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — When Gov. Bill Graves and legislators started talking this year about crafting the state's largest tax relief plan, the recurring theme was giving tax cuts to people who need them most.

The nearly $247 million smorgasbord that Graves intends to sign into law Friday means lower income tax bills for many Kansans, especially the working poor and young couples starting out in life.

But the plan isn't just for low-income earners. Homeowners and businesses would benefit from a $7 million reduction in the state's school property tax — accounting for $71.2 million of the plan's tax cuts.

There are other tax breaks, including sales tax exemptions for non-profit groups and oil and gas severance tax relief.

The plan is possible because of the state's robust economy, producing more state revenue than first imagined for the budget year beginning July 1.

Cutting taxes also is designed to keep voters happy in a year when Graves is seeking a second term, and all 125 House seats are up for grabs. Senators stand for election in two years.

Graves is proud of the plan. It is the version he proposed to lawmakers earlier this month, after they became deadlocked over myriad proposals that ran the spectrum in offerings and outcomes.

GRAVES

The governor sees this as the crown jewel of four years of tax relief. So proud is Graves that after signing the bill Friday, he plans stops in Great Bend, Wichita and Kansas City to recreate the ceremony.

Reducing how much state income tax Kansans have to pay accounts for $36.3 million of the proposal. Personal exemptions will go from $2,000 to $2,250, and standard deductions will increase for all but single taxpayers.

Starting with tax year 1998, the beneficiaries mostly will be families at the lower end of the income scale.

For instance, a single parent with two children earning $17,000 will save $390 in income taxes under the plan. A couple with three children and a $25,000 income will pay about $320 less.

What also will help those earning less than $25,000 is a food sales tax credit to offset income taxes owed.

The food credit is a reworked version of a food sales tax rebate program that didn't get much use. The new plan will raise the eligibility limit from $13,000 to an adjusted gross income of $25,000.

It will be subtracted from the tax liability and would amount to $60 for everyone in a household with an income of $12,500 or less and $30 for those in households with incomes between $12,501 and $25,000.

Another benefit for low-income taxpayers is the earned income tax credit, equal to 10 percent of the amounts claimed under the federal earned income tax credit. The eligibility varies with the number of dependents.

For those earning more, the income tax relief would be less. A childless couple earning $120,000 will see a $33 reduction in their income tax bill. A retired couple receiving $30,000 will receive a $45 cut.

But people in higher income brackets — and in many cases retirees — will benefit if they are property owners.

The school property tax levy will be cut from $27 million to $20 million. That doesn't change any local taxes.

For someone with a $200,000 home, the mill levy reduction will cut the school property tax bill by $145; a person with a $40,000 home will see a savings of around $16.

The plan also will help people thinking about home remodeling. It will create a sales tax exemption for labor services connected with reconstruction, remodeling, repair or replacement of a residence.

A scattering of other sales tax exemptions will apply to churches and similar nonprofit organizations.

The plan also repeals the state inheritance tax and replace it with an estate tax. Under such a plan, estates valued up to $625,000 during the second half of 1998 will incur no liability.

It also will give back a portion of the property taxes paid on commercial and industrial machinery and would expand the existing exemption for oil leases.

Black farmers demonstrate to protest complaint backlog

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With three tractors and a mule, about 100 black farmers demonstrated outside the Agriculture Department on Thursday to underscore their frustration with the Clinton administration's failure to resolve a backlog of discrimination complaints.

CLINTON

"We are American citizens, just as white citizens are," said Phillip Barker, who traveled from Oxford, N.C., to join the protest. "We deserve respect. When are we going to see some justice?"

The main target of their protest was the Justice Department. It concluded this month that a two-year statute of limitations bars most of the 2,000 or so complaining farmers from getting any cash compensation, even if they suffered discrimination in denial of loans and other benefits.

Standing atop a flatbed truck on Independence Avenue, with "Struggle" the mule nearby and the tractors in front, farmer Philip Haynie of Heathsville, Va., compared the battle with the difficult years his great-grandfather faced right after he was freed from slavery.

"We're not dumb. We're not lazy. We are just victims of the system," Haynie said. "It's time for them to let us out of the economic slavery they put us in."

But absent congressional action, the Clinton administration cannot simply approve cash settlements the farmers need to plant crops and buy machinery and supplies. The White House and top Justice and Agriculture department officials are working with the Congressional Black Caucus on legislation that would waive the statute of limitations for the farmers.

Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman met briefly with the farmers.

"We know there are wrongs to be righted. I'm acknowledging that," Glickman told them. "We all know in a democracy, sometimes you can't get everything you want as quickly as you want. We understand the problems and the pain."

Bill Kennedy, Riley County attorney, said fines are typically about $100, in addition to a $45 court cost. If minors knowingly apply for drivers' licenses using false information, they could face felony charges. Sentencing for the charge could include five to 17 months in prison.

Kennedy said Riley County will try about 50 such cases a year, most of which are misdemeanor charges.

"They come in streaks," he said. "Right after school opens, and it seems like there's a bunch of them between Christmas and Easter."

Other common offenses for minors come from the zero-tolerance law and DUIs. When it comes to DUIs, Urban said she will advise students about diversions.

"It's given at the discretion of the prosecuting attorney," she said. "It's an agreement that if the person charged with the offense says they'll do, they agree to drop it, and then there is no court record."

Students who are going through the judicial system often end up seeing Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education service for University Counseling Services at Lafene Health Center.

"There are the court-referred students who it's their first offense," he said. "They're not really alcoholics. They just went out, drank too much and made a mistake. The court has them get an assessment outside of my office in the community. It comes back, and they're not necessarily alcoholic drinkers."

During the semester Arck said he'll see 45 to 50 students. Some of those students come seeking advice or help.

"There is usually a precipitating thing. 'I got a DUI,' or, 'I went out and got really drunk and did something stupid or said something stupid,'" he said. "We'll talk about that. We'll talk about where they want to be with their drinking and how can they moderate it if that's what they want to do."

Arck said he also advises roommates and friends of students who have problems. He tells them how to approach their friend or roommate to offer help.

"Part of that is besides me talking to the student who comes whose roommate is having the problem is (telling them) you can't assume responsibility for that roommate's drinking," he said. "Just basic, minor intervention is about all that a roommate can handle. I'm dealing more with the student who is here than the student who is not here. I say, 'You're good. You've done something. You've taken the first step. You've got to take care of yourself and don't let it affect your studies and your mental health and your happiness."

Arck said most times students deny they have a problem when approached.

"When that roommate is really hurting, they can always, always go back to that person who expressed concern and was caring about them and knows about the resources," he said. "So you always leave the door open that way."

Arck also talks to students about planning.

"I talk about zero tolerance, which means the person driving home is not the least drunk. They are a person who hasn't participated in drinking alcohol," he said. "If you drink a lot, party in groups so hopefully your friends won't let you do anything stupid — try to drive home or fight that 6-8 300-pound guy standing over there. Or go home with that guy who's really, really cute that you met five minutes ago.

"Every time you drink, you take some risks," he said. "You try to minimize those risks or negate them by not drinking."

From his 13 years at K-State, Arck said he has heard stories of pregnancies, sexual assaults, violence, broken bones and swimming deaths — stories that all have links to drinking.

"I can tell you of two students who were killed who were very, very bright and had just graduated and received honors," Arck said.

"They went back home and a couple of days later they died from drinking. They had alcohol and were behind the wheel of a vehicle."

But in his job counseling students, not all stories end that way.

"We win some, too," Arck said. "A young man last year was in big trouble. I said, 'No holding punches. You are an alcoholic. If you don't stop, it probably will get you. We got him into AA, and he came back at the end of the semester and said, 'AA saved my life.'"

Bishop's Heisman supporters hit World Wide Web starts. More than 1,000 people have viewed the page in the past week, including Bishop himself.

"I saw it the other day, but I can't worry about it," Bishop said.

He knows he has to do his job on the field. But he said he's still flattered.

"It's good to know that people are supporting me," he said.

Gates had the idea to put the page together last season after seeing similar sites supporting quarterbacks Dameyune Craig of Auburn and Ryan Leaf of Washington State. He said he's more of a Cats fan than a Bishop fan, but he hasn't seen a more amazing player since he started buying season tickets in 1986.

"I'm a fan of the team, but some of the things he's been able to do are amazing," he said.

"You can't help but be a fan of Michael Bishop. They probably won't admit it, but I bet there's KU fans who are fans of Michael Bishop."

So can Bishop bring the famed trophy to Manhattan?

Gates said he think Bishop's good enough.

He rushed for 556 yards and nine touchdowns last season, both K-State single-season records for quarterbacks.

After one season, he's already No. 4 on K-State's all-time list for career rushing by a quarterback. He has the ability to turn busted plays into touchdowns, and he's shown he can throw the ball 60 yards downfield off the wrong foot while being hit.

He picked apart Syracuse for 317 yards and four touchdowns in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl last season. Two Syracuse safeties were picked in the first round of last Sunday's NFL draft — Tebucky Jones and Donovin Darius.

But he's shown an even stronger ability to throw incomplete passes. He completed only 80 of 185 attempts last season.

However, Bishop, who didn't start with the team until two-a-day practices started last fall, admits he only knew about 75 percent of Snyder's system last season. With more seasoning through spring football, he likely will be more effective this fall.

But will he be effective enough?

"If things turn out, I think it could be done. But they're not gonna give it to a quarterback who only completes 43 percent of his passes," Gates said.

"I think he could get invited to the ceremonies."

Fourteen members went to Bennett Ski School in Bennett, Lou. during spring break.

"Everyone's really dedicated to improving themselves," Arb said. "Right now, we by far have the best ski team we've ever had."

Each member who attended ski school had to pay $600, Arb said.

"That shows a lot of dedication, that they were willing to pay $600," she said.

Arb said the ski team has to fund itself. K-State allocates the team money, but usually not the amount it wants. The skiers don't let the money problem get in the way of their goals.

Manhart said skiers work hard to improve every week in practice.

"We probably run an average of five to eight practices a week," he said.

Some skiers might practice about 10 times a week, Manhart said.

When the practices are over, the members don't go their separate ways. Manhart said the team is close.

"Our team is a very close-knit group. We do a lot of things together outside of practices and competitions," he said.

Jennifer Casten, a member of the ski team since last fall, said the best thing about being a part of the team is belonging to a group of people who share the same interests.

"I'm involved, but I've also made a lot of friends through it," she said. "The friends I've made on the team are lifelong friends."

Casten said she foresees the team growing.

"As we get our name out, the more people will want to join," she said. "Some people don't realize we have a team."

Casten said she thinks some people feel intimidated so they won't join the team. She said some think they are not good enough.

"That's not the case at all. Everyone starts out on the same level," she said. "It just depends on how much they want to improve. They shouldn't let their ability stand in the way."

14-year-old kills teacher at dance

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EDINBORO, Pa. — A 14-year-old boy was charged Saturday with opening fire at an eighth-grade graduation dance. A science teacher was killed, and two pupils and a teacher were wounded.

Andrew Wurst, a pupil at Parker Middle School, shot teacher John Gillette on a patio outside a banquet hall, walked inside and fired several more shots, left the building through a rear exit and was arrested shortly thereafter, police spokesman Mark Zaleski said.

Teen-agers were dancing to the last song when the first of several booms rang out Friday night at Nick's Place, near Edinboro about 100 miles north of Pittsburgh, Pa.

Sobbing girls in satin dresses and terrified boys in neckties huddled outside the hall. Some hid in a closet.

Adam Sarren, 15, said the shots sounded like a cap gun.

"It was pretty horrible. It was like a nightmare," he said. "We were all scared and crying and praying."

A month ago, Wurst joked about killing people and then committing suicide, according to two boys who described themselves as friends of Wurst. Triston Lucas, 14, and Ben Mills, 13, said they did not take him seriously.

"He'd laugh when he said it. You couldn't really take him serious," Lucas said.

Both boys, who attended counseling sessions Saturday at the school, said Wurst did not know Gillette, 48. Wurst never said he planned to kill at the dance, nor had he identified any targets, the boys said.

Gillette, a teacher for 27 years who had organized the dance, was shot in the head.

Two 14-year-old boys were wounded by gunfire; one was grazed across the abdomen and the other shot in the foot. Both were treated at a hospital and released. A female teacher was grazed by a bullet and did not need medical treatment.

Wurst, who carried a .25-caliber handgun registered to his father and a small amount of marijuana, was caught in a field behind the hall just after the shooting by Nick's Place owner James Strand, who carried a shotgun.

Wurst, of nearby McKean, was charged as an adult with criminal homicide, three counts each of aggravated assault and reckless endangerment, as well as drug and gun charges. He was jailed without bond.

School officials said they did not know what motivated the shooting.

Sarren, who said he knew Wurst, described him as a loner who never smiled and dressed sloppily with untucked T-shirts and untied shoes. He said Wurst often wore the same pants for several days in a row.

"He looked like he was dead. He never had his eyes all the way open," Sarren said. "I never liked him at all."

Local schools take precautions to help prevent violence, harm

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

The principal of a Manhattan middle school said he couldn't speak for others in his position, but a shooting isn't something to be expected at any eighth-grade graduation party, anywhere.

"Could it ever happen? I couldn't say yes or no," said Robert Seymour, principal of Susan B. Anthony Middle School. "I'm sure the principal there didn't think it could happen."

A 14-year-old at a middle school in Edinboro, Pa., was charged with killing a science teacher and wounding three other in attendance Saturday at one such party.

Rumors of dangerous situations might come to the surface, Seymour said, and his staff takes them quite seriously.

"We always check out any rumor, no matter how absurd it sounds," he said.

Sylvester Benson, principal at Manhattan High School, said he agreed such an event taking place at a school party isn't something he can worry too much about.

"We take necessary precautions all the time to make sure we have a safe environment for our students and staff," he said. "When things of this nature occur, I don't know what you could do."

Benson said his school has handheld, metal-detecting wands available if a significant danger is rumored to occur

Collectors travel from afar to attend Boyds Bears event

Boyds Bears collectors had a busy weekend. The Country Gift Shop brought Gary Lowenthal, chief designer of the Boyds Bear Collection, to the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome on Sunday to sign Boyds Bear Collection pieces.

More than 1,200 collectors attended the event. Some arrived at the Holiday Inn as early as 5:15 a.m. Many came from out of state.

Stacey Kelton drove from Denver to see Lowenthal and get Lowenthal's signature on one of her bears.

"My boyfriend thinks I'm crazy," she said.

Crazy or not, Kelton was able to get one of her 30 Boyds Bears pieces signed by Lowenthal, who visited the gift shop's branch location at the Holidome.

Lowenthal, known as the "Head Bean" within the company, said the Country Gift Shop is one of only two stores in the nation he has visited without a contest as motivation. Most stores he visits have won a contest with a visit from Lowenthal as the top prize.

He said the staff at the Manhattan gift shop actively has pursued him for a visit.

"There has been an active movement of cajoling and terrorism for the last seven years from the Country Gift Shop," he said. "After a while, persistence pays off.

"It was pure persistence on the part of the staff and owners at the shop here," he said.

Many people traveled from out the area because Lowenthal doesn't give many personal appearances. He said he usually does 10 personal appearances a

Famous bear collection got its start in designer's home

In 1982, on a kitchen table, a new bear was born in Boyd, Md.

Since then, the Boyds Bear Collection, which includes figurines and stuffed animals, can now be seen in almost every gift store across the nation.

Gary Lowenthal, chief designer of the bears, was brought to Manhattan on Sunday by the Country Gift Shop to sign Boyds Bear Collection pieces.

Lowenthal hasn't designed collectables his entire life. He started out in the Peace Corps, and then worked at Bloomingdale's for several years, but decided to leave the corporate world to open an antique store.

"Wasn't much fun in the corporate world," he said.

STORIES BY ANGLEA KISTNER

Hazing victim released from K.C. hospital

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Ernest L. Harris Jr. was released Saturday from the University of Kansas Medical Center, a week after he was beaten, allegedly as part of a fraternity initiation.

Harris, 23, graduated from K-State in December 1997 and was initiated into Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity on April 2, a regional official said.

Harris was taken to the hospital with injuries to his back and kidneys. He was listed in serious condition and was placed on dialysis. Ernest Harris Sr. said his son had been beaten with a paddle, the victim of a hazing by Kappa Alpha Psi.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life at K-State, indefinitely suspended Kappa Alpha Psi as a university organization. Investigations have yet to prove the fraternity's fault, but Bosco said the mere possibility was enough for the suspension.

"We don't tolerate this kind of activity," he said. "Never have, never will."

Kappa Alpha Psi is one of the eight traditionally black fraternities and sororities governed by the National Pan-Hellenic Council. Bosco said the fraternity has existed at K-State since the 1960s and typically had two to 10 members each year. This year it had four members, he said.

K-State's representative organization of National Pan-Hellenic Council had an emergency meeting Wednesday night where members of other black fraternities and sororities pledged to support Harris and Kappa Alpha Psi, but didn't condone the suspected hazing.

Bosco recommended the council adopt an anti-hazing policy similar to the one used by Interfraternity Council.

Bosco said Sunday he was happy to hear Harris had been released from the hospital.

"That's the best news I've heard all day," he said.

The Associated Press contributed to this story.

Blaze damages Justin Hall lab Sunday night

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

A single-alarm fire on Sunday in a Justin Hall laboratory caused nearly $70,000 in damage to the lab and an adjacent office.

No one was injured.

The fire was reported at 6:35 p.m., after students and faculty working in the building smelled smoke coming from the meat and poultry research lab in Justin 127. Manhattan Fire Department Battalion Chief Jerry Snyder said firefighters took 10 minutes to put out the fire, which started when a burner on a cook top stove ignited a paper bag.

"One of the burners was either left on or somebody had bumped it and turned it on, but was definitely on," Snyder said. "There was a paper sack full of soybeans somebody had put there that caught fire.

"It wasn't on top of the burner, but close enough to ignite," he said.

Snyder said most of the damage is from smoke, not water, because the fire was relatively small and required little water to extinguish. He said the thick, black smoke from burning plastic caused most of the damage to the lab and an adjacent graduate student office, Justin 122A.

Cutting-horse competition helps students increase knowledge about breed's traits

The Championship Cutting Horse Competition sponsored by the K-State Horseman's Association took place Saturday and Sunday in Weber Arena.

Cutting horse competitions are an exhibition of a horse's athletic ability and instinct to separate a cow from the herd.

J.D. Weber, reporter for the Horseman's Association and graduate student in animal sciences and industry, said this event is something the animal is bred to do.

"These horses want to cut cattle. They want to compete."

The Horseman's Association sponsors events and activities that increase students' knowledge about horses and is for university students who like horses.

Weber said the purpose of sponsoring the event is to educate members about aspects of the horse industry they might not have known otherwise.

"Most students don't necessarily have the resources to be able to compete in this event. Cutting horses are pretty expensive propositions to keep," Weber said.

Justin Waggoner, activities director and sophomore in animal sciences and industry, said he agreed.

"A lot of us from animal science aren't all knowledgeable about cutting horses. This gives us an opportunity to watch and see top cutting horses in the state of Kansas and possibly potential employers," Waggoner said.

Waggoner said the level of training these horses have is intense and increases the value of the horses used in cutting competitions.

"These are high-dollar horses. Their values are from $30,000 to $50,000 and on up," Waggoner said.

This cutting competition is sanctioned by the National Cutting Horse Association. With this status, competing horses are able to earn points for top awards.

Dirk Blakeslay, trainer from Wilmore, Kan., said he hauls horses to this cutting nearly every year.

This year was a successful showing for Blakeslay. He competed with four horses and won four classes.

He said cutters compete at this event to earn points for the year-end awards sponsored by the Kansas Cutting Horse Association. The top-five horses in the state of Kansas will be recognized.

Nearly 150 entries came from Missouri, Oklahoma, Nebraska and Kansas to compete in this National Cutting Horse Association-sanctioned event.

The sport of cutting evolved from the everyday ranch work where a cowboy has to select one cow from a group of cattle to doctor or to seclude.

In competition, riders silently walk into a herd of cattle at the end of the arena. As the horse and rider enter the herd, they push a small number of calves from the herd into the middle of the pen.

The rider selects one calf and allows the rest to return to the herd.

The natural desire for the calf to return to the herd is matched with the horse's ability to control the cow.

At this point, the rider drops the reins to the neck of the horse and is no longer allowed to direct the horse.

The calf dances back and forth in attempt to return to the herd. The horse is judged by the way it mirrors the movement of the calf.

Appellate court upholds constitutionality of law that makes homosexual sex illegal

TOPEKA — A state law that makes homosexual sex a crime has been upheld as constitutional.

A three-judge panel of the state Court of Appeals refused on Friday to overturn the municipal court misdemeanor conviction of Max D. Movsovitz, a Topeka artist. Movsovitz was arrested in April 1995 in Topeka's Gage Park after soliciting sex from an undercover police officer.

Movsovitz challenged the constitutionality of a Topeka ordinance and the state's anti-sodomy law, arguing they violated his rights to privacy, equal treatment under the law and freedom of expression. He and the American Civil Liberties Union claimed the law unfairly discriminates against homosexuals.

The Court of Appeals panel, in a unanimous unsigned opinion, rejected all of the arguments. Movsovitz can appeal to the Kansas Supreme Court.

"As societal values evolve, the Legislature may follow some other state legislatures and decriminalize private sexual behavior between all consenting adults," the court said. "However, these are issues that should be addressed by legislatures and not courts."

According to court records, two undercover police officers approached Movsovitz while he was parked in Gage Park, the city's largest park and home of the Topeka Zoo. During a conversation, Movsovitz agreed to engage in oral sex.

A Topeka ordinance against soliciting sodomy is based on the state law, which defines sodomy as sex between two people of the same sex or sex with an animal.

People, pets participate in Dog-N-Jog

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

Exercising the dog was fun instead of a chore for the more than 100 people who brought their dogs to the Third-Annual Dog-N-Jog at K-State on Saturday. More than 200 people competed in the 10K, 5K and 1.5K Fun Run races.

Kim Weber, junior veterinary student and winner of the smallest-dog award, said this was the second year she participated in Dog-N-Jog's Fun Run.

"It is great," she said. "It was a great opportunity to walk with friends and your dogs. It was definitely fun."

Cindy Risen, co-chairman and junior veterinary student, said although not everyone who participated ran with their dogs, it looked like everyone had a good time.

"I was pleased," she said. "It was a beautiful day, and that may have brought some more people out.

Not all of the participants were students. Pat Melgares, news coordinator for the communication department at the College of Agriculture, ran all three races and won the men's division of the 10K race.

"My wife and I both run, and it just made it something for the family to do together on a Saturday morning," he said. "During the 5K, I ran with my wife and pushed the stroller with our two youngest sons in it."

Dog-N-Jog is sponsored by the Class of 1999 of the K-State College of Veterinary Medicine and the Veterinary Medical Teaching Hospital. The event was started in 1996 as a fund-raiser for the class's graduation ceremonies and to raise donations for Kansas Specialty Dog Service Inc.

KSDS, which is in Washington, Kan., is a non-profit organization that provides guide dogs to the visually impaired and service dogs to the physically disabled at no cost.

The junior veterinary class tripled the amount of money it donated to KSDS last year by donating $1,500 this year.

Last year, $300 was donated to KSDS and $200 was given to the memorial fund for Christopher Wilson, the 11-year-old boy from Milford, Kan., who died after being attacked by a dog.

"We nearly doubled our participation this year, and that is why we could donate so much more money," Risen said.

Medals were given to the top-three finishers in the men's and women's divisions in the 5K and 10K races. Awards were given to the largest dog, all children participants and many participants of the Fun Run.

"WE NEARLY DOUBLED OUR PARTICIPATION THIS YEAR, AND THAT IS WHY WE COULD DONATE SO MUCH MORE MONEY."

New tavern draws patrons downtown for inexpensive beer

BRENNA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

New banners featuring Miller Light Fiesta Time at Three Roses Cantina, 110 N. Third, are drawing people to the cheapest place in town to buy a beer.

Paul Foltz, owner of the Cantina, said he rented the location to store some construction items. He then recycled the building into a bar.

Foltz also works for Goetsch-Irvine car dealership, sells cellular phones in the Manhattan Town Center and is running for a seat on the Manhattan City Commission.

Apart from politics and car sales, this is Foltz's first venture into the bar business.

He already is ensuring return customers by keeping their dollars behind the bar, saving them for a time when customers might be down on their luck.

"People will never be broke if they put a message on a $1 on the mirror behind the bar, and when they come in they can always have a beer," Foltz said.

Foltz's staff consists of four employees — all students or former students at K-State.

Michelle McGinnis, junior in general education and music, tends bar at the Cantina. She said a real mix of people like to come to the bar.

"Usually we do have people sitting all along the bar. One day, there were bikers, college students and farmers," McGinnis said.

Foltz had similar stories about the clientele who visit from all over the nation, as he gestured to a multi-colored map of the United States on a door.

"Everybody gets along real well. There have been friendships made already," Foltz said.

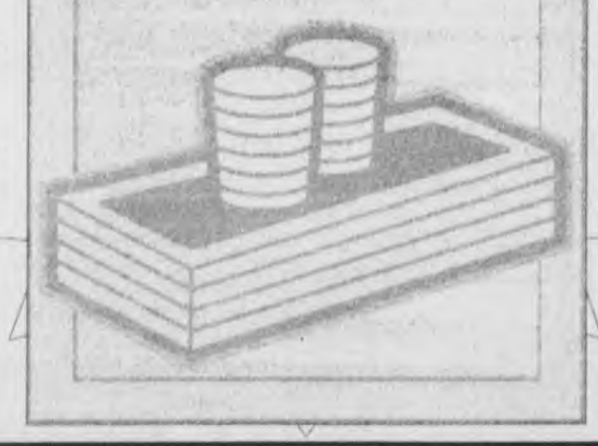
Customer relations are important because there is not much room for the customers to disagree. Occupancy of the bar is not to exceed 18, and although a beer garden is planned for the alley behind the building, the alley is off limits until the garden is complete.

"All drinks have to stay inside until I get the rose garden finished and work something out with the building next door," Foltz said.

Foltz said he has a low overhead that enables him to sell beer at a low cost. He said he is not really making a profit from the 49-cent beers but is just trying to keep things fair.

Inexpensive beer is not the only unique thing at the Cantina. Foltz is planning on selling prepared deli sandwiches and welcomes anyone who wants to bring in food from area restaurants.

One neighbor and direct competitor to the Cantina is Mel's Tavern, positioned directly across the street. Doug Long, owner of Mel's, has been in the bar business since 1974 and said his business has not been affected by the Cantina's opening.



"I've known Paul for 25 years. This is just another business venture of his," Long said.

Long said having lower-priced beers competing against his $2 bottles makes no difference to the business at Mel's.

"Like newspapers have to sell ads to break even, unless you have lots and lots of money to throw away you can't sell your beer for cost," Long said.

End-of-year crunch demands setting priorities

In the last two weeks of classes before finals and graduation, every minute counts. If you haven't already, now is the time to get serious about classes and set priorities.

The crunch has started. In these last weeks, most significant class projects are due, and the final opportunities for regular test points and extra credit are possible.

Don't give up on classes just because it's been a rough semester. There is still plenty of time to redeem grades with a strong performance on the last tests, papers and projects. However, it's time to concentrate and do the best work possible.

Don't try to memorize the material right before tests, and be as clear and concise as possible. Late-night cram sessions rarely work. Most often, trying to learn and understand information in a short period of time before the exam only results in a lack of sleep and unnecessary panic.

Use the time remaining wisely. After prioritizing classes, remember to relax and spend time with the people who matter to you. There is room to have a good time, and if your work is done, you'll be able to enjoy it more. Spend time with the people who matter to you, friends graduating in three weeks and good professors. Let people you care about know how much they mean. The time passes too quickly.

Don't take results for granted. Make sure you understand where you stand in classes, check the schedule for finals and make a list of things to accomplish. Remember, it still is possible not to graduate. This is the most important time to follow through with plans and complete projects on time.

Planning is extremely important. Don't procrastinate in areas where you might have to vie with others for access and services. Check out the book you need, make the important trip to a copy center soon and go to the computer labs early.

The last weeks are usually the most stressful. No matter how busy you are, try to get an adequate amount of sleep and work ahead whenever possible. Eat healthy and be aware of your limitations.

Spring fever

Students should resist annual spring temptations

VIEWPOINT

LISA DETHLOFF
Lisa is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Lisa at batman@ksu.edu.

There is an epidemic sweeping across campus — an illness that has proportional effects on people. It is spring fever, and it has infected the K-State population with its annual dose and only a few cures are possible. The symptoms for spring fever are cutting classes, tan lines, lack of focus, scraped knees from in-line skating crashes, and my personal favorite — allergies.

Because winter is still eight months away, everyone needs to work together to fight spring fever. There are two options available — either let spring fever take over your body and mind, or just enjoy spring for all of the neat things it brings. Instead of being another statistic who was taken over by spring fever, resist the temptations of cutting classes and losing focus on schoolwork and participate in the season's annual events and signs that the illness is here.

FINALS: True, the preparation is a pain, but classes are finished, and you only have to be on campus for a couple of hours to fill in the little circles or write everything you know in the blue books. Plus, after finals are completed, you can sell your books back and then take the money on a little Aggieville trip.

GRADUATION: This is the only time when it is acceptable socially to yell and ring cow bells at an event where the dress code is suits and dresses. It is also the graduates' five seconds of fame as they walk across the stage, shake hands for an eternity and pray the last name is not mispronounced.

FRISBEE GOLF: Just what the heck is this sport? I mean I see people on campus throwing the flying discs but do not see the point of the whole thing. I have looked around and never can find any holes that are big enough for a frisbee, so just what is the object? If I were playing the game, I would just aim for people.

PLANNING SUMMER VACATIONS: It now takes me hours to get my friends' summer addresses and remember who is moving, who has an internship, who is stuck in summer school and who is going home to farm. I believe I will have to give my sister the most-unusual-summer-vacation award. She is taking 14 hours of summer school and is studying how cow brains will help to cure cancer. Anyone want to join her?

WEDDINGS: I am attending six weddings this summer, so I have decided to make one massive trip to the mall to buy all of the gifts. Then everyone makes fun of me because I usually wear black to the joyous occasion. It is not because I am morbid or depressed that it's not me walking down the aisle. On the contrary, as long as people continue to get married, there is less pressure on me. I just like wearing black even at the mid-July weddings at 3 in the afternoon with the temperature at 95 degrees and the humidity at 80 percent.

MY BIRTHDAY: This, of course, is my favorite symptom of spring fever. Just ask anyone, and you'll probably hear that I turn into the most annoying person on the planet because I go around and sing "Happy Birthday" to myself. This year's birthday was particularly fun because I was fortunate to celebrate it with my friends, eat a Batman-and-Robin cake and not get sick on tequila shots.

So here are some of the symptoms of spring fever. I could have listed the basic symptoms such as smelling the flowers and playing golf, but you can always go to a flower store or play golf on the Sony PlayStation. I hope everyone has great spring and doesn't forget the schoolwork. You can play later — unless you are my sister.

Men should love their wives as Jesus Christ loved church

VIEWPOINT

SAM SACKETT
Sam is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Sam at sjs8645@ksu.edu

Many females are hesitant about the man's role in marriage as stated in the Bible. Much of the hesitation lies not in misunderstanding, but in accurate observations of men not fulfilling their responsibilities. Men have failed in large part to demonstrate true love toward women, thus neglecting their first priority to them.

"Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her ..." Ephesians 5:25.

Women increasingly are choosing either to view our lack of respect as acceptable or abandon us completely. The increased outrage calling for women's rights principally lies in our choosing to disrespect and look down upon them. We have fallen short of demonstrating the esteem they deserve. We have chosen to abandon loving them as Christ loved the church.

No wonder women are angered by the mere mention of "the man's role" in marriage. They have not seen evidence that it actually can be lived.

Man's idea of love has turned into a game of sexual pleasure and personal gain, rather than commitment to the woman and fulfillment through being a companion to her. Encouraging the woman to become all she can is taboo. She has goals and dreams, too. I'll say it directly, men. Helping your wife fulfill those dreams is one of your roles as her husband. Marriage is not just for your gain. It is mutual. A partnership. A commitment. A covenant.

We are driven by many things, none more prevalent than sex. But it has evolved into an obsession. No longer is sex saved for marriage; instead, it is merely an act. This mania in our country for sensual pleasure is evident in advertisements. Television, movies and many popular songs are rooted in sexual appeal.

Pornography spreads swiftly throughout the Internet, and the sale of lewd magazines in grocery stores and convenience stores exemplifies men's perversion of women's sexuality, as if they are nothing more than flesh and toys for cheap enjoyment.

We have surrendered our integrity as men. Self-control has been eradicated. We would rather look at a woman's body, make grunts, and fantasize rather than honor her. Men probably deserve most of the flack women are observant enough to give them.

Women, be sure you are demanding high qualities in the men you marry. Don't settle for what you can get by with. If the guy doesn't respect and honor you, your dreams, your goals and your hopes — don't commit yourself to him. He doesn't deserve you.

Love your wife as Christ loved the church. Do we have any idea what that means? Christ wanted the best for his people. He sacrificed all selfish ambition to give himself to the church. He listened. He believed in his people. He didn't criticize them, but chose to love them — passionately. He committed himself. He devoted his life even unto death. He loved his people.

I don't see this reflected in our society. I do see the opposite. Men beating their wives. Men yelling at their wives. Men looking at other women lustfully. Men complaining about their wives. Men demanding of their wives instead of working with them. Taking, taking, taking. Little giving.

Concerning general etiquette: Men, you don't open the door for women because they aren't capable. (I've seen many women who are in better physical shape to open a door than we are.) If a woman doesn't want you to open doors for her, respect her wishes. Your reputation as a good person is not the purpose for acting kind toward women. You show kindness because they deserve it.

I am not saying to treat them as if they can't do anything for themselves. On the contrary, you respect them. It is as simple as that. I think women would be more receptive to men if words such as commitment, love and respect were traits acted on, not just spoken about.

Men, if you have chosen to act selfishly toward women, don't expect them to treat you with esteem just because you do a few nice things for them. You must live in love.

It is not about having power over a woman. If that is your motive, believe me, she usually can peer through the facade and see your selfish intentions. If you want power, don't force that over women. They were not made so you could treat them with disrespect. Your wife is your partner. You are hers. Marriage is about unity, not domination.

If we become men of integrity, men of our word and men of true love, our actions will reflect the love that Christ had for his people. And man in turn will get one of the best things this life has to offer — an intimate relationship with his wife, his best friend.

Parents should teach children responsibility

Editor,

I would like to thank Chris Handlin for his courageous and insightful letter in Friday's Collegian. Handlin was right on the ball when he said we are wasting our time trying to fight underage drinking. Stopping people under 21 from drinking is never going to happen, and anyone who thinks it can be stopped is naive, hypocritical or both.

But, unlike Handlin, I do condone underage drinking and think it should start early. In the home. With parents serving as role models.

I'm 30 years old, so I have no personal stake in the issue of underage drinking. But I agree that time, resources and efforts would be spent better on fighting problem drinking, like drunk driving or binge drinking, than wasting them on underage drinking.

The problems of underage drinking are caused by unrealistic drinking ages and a culture that doesn't know how to deal with alcohol properly.

For some reason, people in this country have gotten into the mindset that you drink to get drunk. Few people here drink wine or beer as part of meals, as they do in much of Europe where drinking ages are nonexistent. Drinking is seen as a party activity here, and that's why we have so much of a problem with abusive drinking. It's not part of everyday life.

Over there, you drink for the mild, pleasant "buzz" that comes with a beer or two and as an aid to digestion.

Drinking ages also contribute to the problem of abusive drinking in that they set up drinking in the minds of young people as a grown-up thing to do. In a culture with no rites of passage for adulthood, drinking has become a de facto rite of passage. It's something cool to do when you get to college.

When I was in Europe last fall, I talked about this issue with Europeans. They almost unanimously agree that the United States is going about the issue the wrong way. In places where drinking starts at age 9 or 10, as part of the family meal, the mystique of drinking is negated. As one young woman in Greece told me, "Over here, if we see a guy get drunk, we look down on him as something less than a man. There's something wrong with his manhood if he can't hold his liquor." Not so in the United States, where getting drunk is seen as a "manly" thing to do.

Dining halls at universities in Europe routinely serve wine and beer with meals. How's that for a shocking idea? Derby Dining Center providing wine with dinner? Inconceivable.

And that's the problem: We treat alcohol as somehow being an illicit thing from which children and teenagers must be protected. We have created a mystique about alcohol that fuels problem drinking.

We need to start teaching children how to drink early properly. As it stands now, they reach their late teens, start drinking without guidance and overdo it. Our culture and laws create an engine that drives problem drinking.

So let's stop pretending we can fight underage drinking and instead take a realistic approach. Repeal all the drinking-age laws. Start working on creating a culture that treats alcohol in a responsible, respectful manner.

We shouldn't be having to teach people how to drink at age 21, when they get to college. Their parents should be doing that in the home at a much earlier age.

Salud!

Respecting racial issues requires understanding

Editor,

I would like to comment on the letter written by Alec Coughlin called "Reader says column promotes stereotypes." The remarks he made to Pamela Manning were unnecessary.

Coughlin is making two statements. The first one would be: People of color, stop complaining. The second statement is: What about me? Granted, the first statement was not a direct quote, but I think this was the type of message he was trying to send. Can anyone point out the contradiction?

The race issue always will be in our society, because we are unable to respect different ethnic views. The reason for not being able to respect them is that we do not take the time to understand them.

Coughlin also said the things that happened 200 years ago should not affect Manning. However, I do not see how it can not. We as individuals base our views on society from personal experience, education, media and our families.

Do you know anything about your grandfather? Do his views seem to be the same as your father's? Do your father's views seem to be the same as yours? Either you are one smart person, having two older generations listen to you, or you learned your values from them.

The white race came to this country with the idea of individualism and a new start. The black race came to this country as slaves. During this time, the white race started exploring and developing the United States for a strong future. The black race started working.

The black race felt cheated and developed a hatred toward the white race. It decided to stick together, and it made sure its children were smart enough not to trust the white race. The same happened on the other side — the white race made sure its children had nothing to do with the black race. And it's been passed down from generation to generation.

We as a society have become more educated, and because of civil rights movements, we had to learn more about each other. So, in most parts of the country, the tension is not so extreme. However, the ideas are still there.

In this situation, no one is right and no one is wrong. We base our feelings through the situations we face in life, so we see it at different angles. In fact, there are not two people who view the world the exact same way.

So, Coughlin, get off Manning's back and live your life without complaining.

By the way, I am also a white male.

Students should follow off-campus regulations

Editor,

As my husband and I were on our way out of Manhattan one night, we almost hit a young man as he ran between stopped cars on the south side of Anderson Avenue.

We were going east on the north side of the street and the light had just turned green, so we weren't going very fast — not even close to the speed limit. If he been going just one step slower, we would have hit him. Thank goodness we weren't rear-ended. It could have happened with just a blink of an eye.

Just because students have the right-of-way on campus doesn't mean they can abuse the laws off campus. Students wonder why they get hurt when they forget they are not on campus and do not have the right-of-way. Most college students are old enough to cross streets by themselves. Just remember you can get hurt, and yes, bones break and you can bleed. Someone could hurt you without that intent. Then they would have to deal with that on their conscience, and it wasn't even their fault. Come on, students, wake up — don't ruin someone else.

We just want to get home safe so we can enjoy the nice evenings, also. Thank you for letting me voice my opinion. I enjoy your paper and read it daily at work.

FOR THE LOVE OF MONEY

Casinos give students gambling outlets

"I won! I won! I won!" was a familiar cry heard outside of Bud Moore's classrooms after her weekend trip to Harrah's Prairie Band Casino near Topeka.

Moore, senior in speech and English, beat the odds and won $2,500 playing quarter slot machines.

"I didn't know how much I won. It just flashed up 10,000 coins," she said. "The guy next to me had to tell me how much I won."

Moore said three men counted out the money to her in $100 bills. She said she had to be escorted out so she would not be mugged.

This win is not the norm when it comes to gambling, said Rob Ryan, table-games director at Sac and Fox Casino.

"Overall, we're always going to make more than the player," he said. "I think most people know that."

In Kansas, statistics show the average player loses 17 cents on every dollar that is bet, Ryan said. He said even players who have perfect strategy still will lose 17 percent overall.

Ryan said he also thinks the casinos want to see people win.

"People have to win or they'll never come back," he said. "We celebrate the wins for the customer."

College-aged gamblers are more likely to play games like slot machines and blackjack because they are easier to understand, said Dan Stromer, general manager at Golden Eagle Casino.

> "DON'T CHASE GOOD MONEY AFTER BAD. THE ODDS AREN'T GOING TO CHANGE."
> ROB RYAN
> table-games director at Sac and Fox Casino

Stromer said games like craps and poker attract a more experienced player.

"Table games have a lot to do with a person's ability to play the games properly. It takes a lot more thought," he said.

Jennifer Stewart, marketing assistant at Sac and Fox Casino, said the table games were more intimidating because of the higher stakes. She said many casinos have a minimum $5 bet at tables and slot machines can range anywhere from a nickel to high-dollar bets.

"With slots, it's a given. You put your money in and pull," she said. "I think I find poker and craps to be more intimidating because there are so many more rules."

Renee Zacharias, senior in English, said she prefers to stick with the slot machines because of the expenses.

"I take what I can afford to lose, which is about $15. I just play quarter slots," she said. "Everything else is just too much money."

Zacharias said the most she won was $25 while playing quarter slots.

"We ended up spending it all anyway, but we were really excited," she said.

"We were jumping around. It was a big deal to us."

When it comes to giving tips for safe and responsible gambling, casino officials said people should never bring along more money than they can afford to spend.

"Don't chase good money after bad," Ryan said. "The odds aren't going to change."

"When you go into a casino, take the amount of money you feel comfortable spending," Stewart said. "Stick with it. It takes control sometimes."

Stewart also suggested leaving the ATM card or purse at home to help resist temptation.

Damon Engelhaupt, junior in nutrition and exercise science, said this strategy works well for him.

"When I go, I only bring money that I know I am going to lose," he said.

"If I come back with $50, I feel better than I thought I would."

For players who want experience playing the more difficult card games without losing much money, Stewart suggested watching for "quarter craps."

She said Sac and Fox Casino sometimes offers this alternative so people can learn to play without high risks like the $5 minimum at most tables.

Casino officials also advise gamblers to learn the rules. Most casinos offer gaming brochures that teach the basic theories and rules. Stewart said some people just stand back and watch more experienced gamblers to learn the rules.

"Learn the games as well as you can," Ryan said.

"Know the strategies."

Alternatives available for under-21 gambling

For students younger than 21, there aren't many gambling options in Kansas.

A representative at Harrah's Prairie Band Casino said people younger than 21 might have to travel as far as Phoenix, Ariz., to enter a Harrah's casino.

Some underage risk takers at K-State said they recommend playing bingo, purchasing lottery tickets and betting at the racetracks as alternatives to gambling in casinos.

Austin Morgan, freshman in political science, said he enjoys playing Keno and bingo as an alternative to casino gambling because he is not 21.

Morgan said he has discovered a system to Keno, but bingo is a different story.

"It gets so expensive, especially in bingo," he said. "The risks are high."

Morgan said he mistakenly called out "bingo" in one round and made all the players mad.

"I misunderstood the rules," he said.

Morgan said he would advise other students to participate in these activities as long as they know the odds are against them.

Many clerks at convenience stores said lottery tickets are popular among college students.

Bradley Iverson, freshman in business, said he thought lottery tickets could be addictive because of his experiences working at a convenience store in his hometown.

"I had about five repeat costumers who would come in for hours," he said.

Iverson said he thought people could develop a pattern after they buy their first lottery ticket.

"If you win the first time, you think it's good," he said. "But if you lose, you never want to buy them again."

Women golfers end season with 11th place Big 12 finish

The K-State women's golf team finished its season Sunday in Norman, Okla., at the Big 12 Championships with a three-day total of 981 (337-328-316) for an 11th-place finish.

The Wildcats played their best round of golf Sunday with a total of 316. Sophomore Carrie Chambers led K-State with a total of 240, which tied her for 31st place.

The tournament medalist was Texas A&M's Isabelle Rosberg, who finished with a 225 total (73-75-77). Texas A&M won the team competition with a total of 919 (299-312-308).

Other Cats in the tournament were Jane Yi (93-80-73 — 246) in 44th place, Ann Slater (85-86-79 — 250) in 48th, Mitzi Taylor (80-87-85 — 252) in 52nd and Traci Bennings (91-83-84 — 258) in 58th.

Cats take 2 from Iowa State

AMES, Iowa — K-State (19-25, 8-14) smacked four home runs and nine doubles in a 22-8 romp of Iowa State on Sunday.

Nine of K-State's runs came at the top of the ninth inning, which included doubles by Josh Marn, Brian Bobier and Yancy Ayres and a homer by Marn that drove in three runners.

The closest the Cyclones (15-23, 8-14) came was at the end of the first inning, when the teams were tied at 3 after a three-run homer by Iowa State's Shawn Leimbek. Bobier hit a double, and Marn singled at the top of the inning for the Wildcats.

Iowa State got to within 6-5 at the bottom of the fourth inning on a double by Brad Bjorklund but the Wildcats cruised from there, adding doubles by Chet Savage, Ayres and Eric Sommerhauser. Quinn Cravens tripled for K-State.

Leimbek homered again in the seventh inning to drive in two runs and Matt McDonough added another, but they weren't enough for the Cyclones.

Twelve of K-State's 23 hits went for extra bases. Ayres also homered in the third inning.

The Cats won the first game of a twinbill on Saturday 4-2 and lost the latter 6-5.

Chris Traylor (2-5) was K-State's winner. Brian Curtin (0-5) took the loss.

Rookies flood Chiefs' camp

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The hit of the day belonged to Robert Williams, a cornerback out of North Carolina drafted in the fifth round last weekend, who put a savage blow on Shawn McWashington, a free agent out of Washington State.

"Great play. That's the way to fight, Robert," Coach Marty Schottenheimer yelled to Williams as he and McWashington wrestled on the ground for the ball.

The most embarrassing moment on the first day of the Kansas City Chiefs' rookie camp belonged to a group of confused young men packed into an elevator.

When the elevator doors opened, they turned the wrong way and tried several doors before someone mercifully took them in tow and showed them the way to the lockerroom.

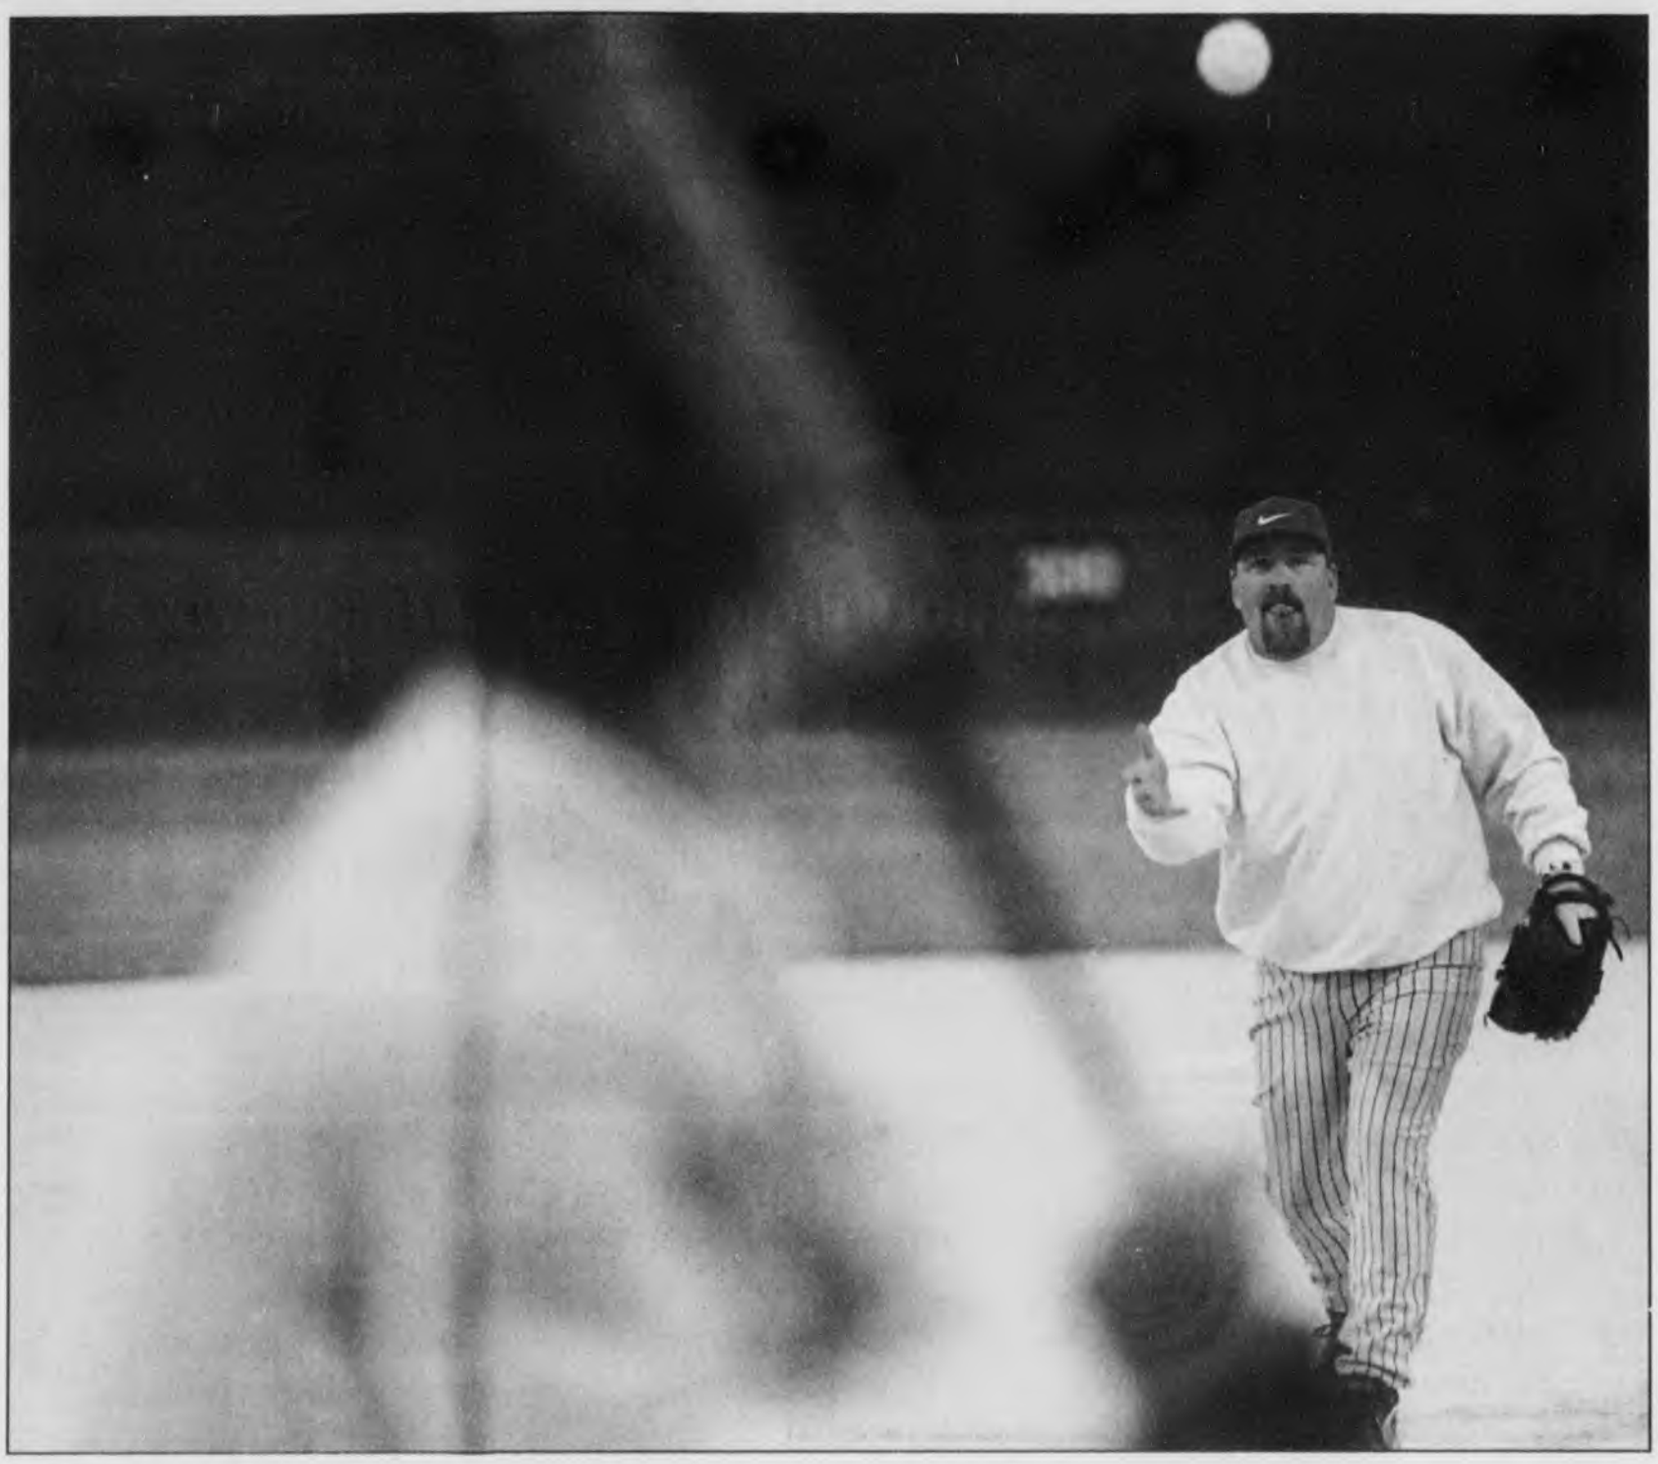
"You kind of feel like a freshman in college again," said Rahsaan Shehee, a running back from Washington who was the Chiefs' third-round pick.

"You get out there and just kind of stand around waiting for everybody to make the first move. But everybody's making me feel very comfortable here."

The Chiefs, whose minicamp had always taken place on the weekend after the college draft, are trying something different this year. Most of the veterans are not here, leaving the rookies and other young players time to get more instruction and more repetitions.

Drawing the most attention was Victor Riley. The 6-foot-5, 321-pound offensive tackle out of Auburn was the Chiefs' No. 1 choice. Although Schottenheimer maintains that left tackle is the hardest position to learn outside of quarterback, he's making bold public predictions that Riley will compete right away.

"We went one-on-one with a lot of defensive linemen, just going play after play after play," Riley said. "The speed level is twice what it was in college."



Getting his feet wet in the NFL without all the savvy, battle-tested veterans getting in the way suited Riley just fine he said.

"I think we get a chance to get some snaps," Riley said. "That gives us an advantage over some other teams because we get a lot of plays.

"I think we're going to learn quicker if we run the plays rather than see them on the board."

As far as Schottenheimer saying he's going to contribute right away, Riley said he does not feel intimidated.

"Not at all. I want to be the best I can be, and for me to do that, I have to come out here every day and work as hard as I can and try to get better," he said. "I know I can contribute, and I want to."

Home-run derby decides winner of softball tourney

BYRON VOGEL

Low temperatures failed to cool off the bats of two softball teams Sunday night as the Mental Errors and the Aggieville Merchants combined for 45 runs in the championship game of the Alpha Delta Pi Softball Classic before the Mental Errors captured the title, 25-20.

The tournament began at 8 a.m. Sunday with 28 teams competing and paying an entry fee of $85 per team. Proceeds from the philanthropy will be donated to the Ronald McDonald's House in Topeka.

The Mental Errors, a team from Wichita comprising mainly ex-baseball players, flexed their offensive muscle during their sixth and final game of the day. The first six batters in the lineup smashed eight home runs, making the 300-foot fences at the Anneberg Sports Complex appear closer than those of a little league baseball diamond.

With players ranging from 25 to 34 years old, the Mental Errors typically play in about two softball tournaments per month. Described as "just a pick-up team" by cleanup man Danny Driskill, the Mental Errors enjoy this success in only their first year together.

Driskill, who played baseball at K-State from 1989 to 1993, said it isn't unusual for the team to play seven or eight games in one day.

"I wouldn't say this is all in a day's work. This is just basically how a lot of tournaments are," he said. "We'll feel it tomorrow. We aren't young anymore."

Driskill provided plenty of his own pop for the Mental Errors by jacking two tape-measure shots over the fence.

Lead-off hitter Troy Welborn, who hit one of the team's eight blasts, said Sunday's tournament provided a rare chance for the team to put its power on display.

"The league we usually play in has a home-run limit. We've got the power, and we like to use it when we can," Welborn said.

And use it they did.

After falling behind 16-15 on a left-handed home run by Aggieville Merchants' switch-hitting second baseman Chad Rodriguez in the top of the fifth, the Mental Errors ripped three homers in a six-run onslaught during their half of the inning.

Mental Errors pitcher and left fielder Tom Ford proved to be the hero by swatting a three-run home run in the fifth, which he followed up with a dazzling catch in left field. With two outs and his team nursing a 21-17 lead, Ford reached over the top of the fence to haul in a fly ball that would have brought the Aggieville Merchants to within one run. Teammates celebrated the catch, which Ford later said was lucky.

The Aggieville Merchants munched on Hardee's takeout in between innings, but the food didn't help provide the needed offense, as they fizzled for one run in the sixth and three in the seventh. It didn't matter, though. The Aggieville Merchants — who include several former Washburn University players and one person who played minor-league ball in the San Diego Padres organization — would have needed to win another game from the Mental Errors in order to win the double-elimination tournament, and they already had indicated they would not stick around to play their 11th game of the day.

As it was, game two never materialized as the Mental Errors thwarted a three-run, seventh-inning rally to preserve the victory.

"We just had a fun time and we enjoyed ourselves, and the girls were friendly," Ford said as he collected his reward for winning the tournament, a free T-shirt from the team's ADPi coaches.

Cats swing into final competition of year in Big 12 Tournament

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's men's golf team will tee off Tuesday at the Prairie Dunes Country Club in Hutchinson, Kan., for the second annual Big 12 Tournament.

K-State sophomore Brian Racette has finished first among the Wildcats in every tournament this spring but two. He said seven of the competing Big 12 teams are ranked in the top 50, and K-State is looking at tough competition.

"If we do as well as last year, we'll finish in the top half," Racette said.

Senior Matt Murdoch also has helped the team this season with a 76-stroke average, and K-State coach Tim Norris said if Murdoch has a good individual tournament, then the Cats will do well in the tournament.

"Matt is one of our best players, and for our team to play well Matt needs to do well," he said.

Murdoch said he knew at the beginning of the year his teammates were looking him to lead them into the tournament. During the summer, he played in tough tournaments to get ready for the spring season.

"I've showed signs of improvement in the tournament in Wichita, and as a senior I should lead the team," he said.

Prairie Dunes is a nationally ranked course, and the Big 12 Tournament was there last year.

"It is ranked between 10 and 20 in the nation," he said. "Not a day goes by where the team doesn't talk about the golf course."

Norris said the players are familiar with the Prairie Dunes course, and he said the team has faced tough winds this spring, especially in the past three tournaments.

"All of the players have played at Prairie Dunes, and they know what to expect," he said. "A lot is going to depend on the wind."

Racette said the team should have an advantage over the other teams because it has had plenty of practice in the wind.

"At Prairie Dunes there aren't many trees, and it's windy," he said. "It has the hardest greens in the state."

Murdoch said that last year, the teams from the south didn't do too well on the course.

"As far as the Big 12, anything can happen," he said. "I've seen some nationally ranked players end up with high scores."

Murdoch said the course is a challenge to any golfer.

"Anyone who had played on it knows it is no joke," Murdoch said. "It's a test of everyone's playing ability."

Last week, the team practiced in the morning at Brandeberry Indoor Complex and in the afternoon at Fort Custard Golf Course. The team will practice today at Prairie Dunes.

K-State coaches have right idea on issue of athletes getting jobs for college

VIEWPOINT

BYRON VOGEL

Byron is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Byron at byronv@ksu.edu.

Leave it to the NCAA to come up with the worst possible way to deal with a problem.

Last week, the NCAA gave final approval to Proposition 62, which grants college athletes the right to have part-time jobs as a means to earn up to $2,000 a year. In doing so, it opened the door for all sorts of shenanigans by big-time athletes and boosters with dollar signs in their eyes.

For K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury and other coaches who try to insulate their players from overzealous boosters, this latest scheme is all but an invitation for corruption, and in Asbury's words, "a disaster."

During his guest appearance last week on ESPN Radio's "The Tony Kornheiser Show," Asbury said Proposition 62 "has the potential for gross problems and abuse." While he did say he favored a monthly stipend for student-athletes, Asbury said inviting boosters back into the fray will be a nightmare for coaches and athletics directors.

This is especially true when the new rule specifically permits "representatives of athletics interests," a euphemism for boosters, to secure employment for athletes. Think about it: When was the last time the NCAA uncovered recruiting violations that did not involve boosters?

Most college towns don't have enough jobs for every student-athlete, and as Bill Snyder told his players last week, there's no way they'll even have the time to work in addition to meeting the demands of playing sports and studying. This alone will create all sorts of questions about the legitimacy, or lack thereof, of many booster-secured jobs.

For instance, if a star football player works as a bartender or a valet parking attendant at an alumni-owned establishment, what's keeping someone from handing him a $20 tip for every drink he pours or every car he parks?

Why would he punch a clock at a warehouse when a booster will pay him $2,000 to go up on the roof of a building to do suntan research during the summer? Asbury said he thought only 40 to 50 percent of athletes' jobs actually will involve work, an estimate he described as optimistic.

This is not to say college athletes shouldn't be compensated. Yes, on one hand it's sad to give athletes free college educations and then tell them they aren't getting anything. But most college athletes aren't Chris Webber or Peyton Manning. They don't have the promise of lifetime financial security, and their scholarships cover only the bare necessities. Meanwhile, universities and the NCAA earn millions, while some student-athletes can't afford to go on a date.

Asbury said he thought a stipend of $200 a month would be adequate. That's a lot less than other students can make in a month, but at least it's something, especially for the growing number of athletes who come to college from low-income or single-parent households. A stipend also might help to keep boosters farther than arm's length from these athletes.

Perhaps a more thoughtful proposal by the NCAA would include post-graduation savings accounts for athletes. Monitoring the inevitable infractions that will accompany Proposition 62 will require so much futile effort, time, paperwork and money. The NCAA and athletics departments would be wiser to place some of that money — a percentage of revenue from bowl games and the NCAA Tournament, for example — into trust funds.

For the 98 percent of college athletes who never go on to play professional sports, having $30,000 to $40,000 waiting in the bank is a tremendous incentive to complete their degrees. This also would show that the NCAA and the schools have a genuine interest in athletes' lives and futures instead of being obsessed with their here-and-now profitability.

If Asbury was right when he said 100 percent of college coaches oppose Proposition 62, then how could the NCAA even consider the measure, much less approve it? When the NCAA has bent over backward for decades trying to keep boosters out of the recruiting process, why on earth would it now give boosters full access to athletes on a daily basis? With Proposition 62, some athletes will learn more about economics from alumni-owned hotels, restaurants and auto dealerships than they ever will in a college classroom.

When that's the case, you call it what it is — a disaster.

Manhattan students transplant seeds, trees from Konza Prairie

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School seventh-grade students planted native grasses, flowers and two trees from the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area on school grounds Friday, the 125th anniversary of Arbor Day.

The 109 students hand-picked the seeds from the prairie and transported them to restore the long-lost prairie land and to invest the lives of future students.

Nancy McClanathan, seventh-grade social-studies teacher, told students that getting involved with the prairie is part of a long-term plan.

She said students will continue to plant other gardens and start making trails.

The middle school is built on farmland that used to be prairie. Valerie Wright, environmental educator for the Konza Prairie, helped students with the seeds and told them how the seeds need to be planted in order for grass to grow.

"We started this program about a year ago," Wright said. "The students came out to the Konza in the fall and they are coming out again this spring."

Seventh-grade student Shawn Dawes earned the chance to plant one of the burr oak trees.

"I am proud that I get to help out my school and that I get to plant a tree for the students in the future," Dawes said.

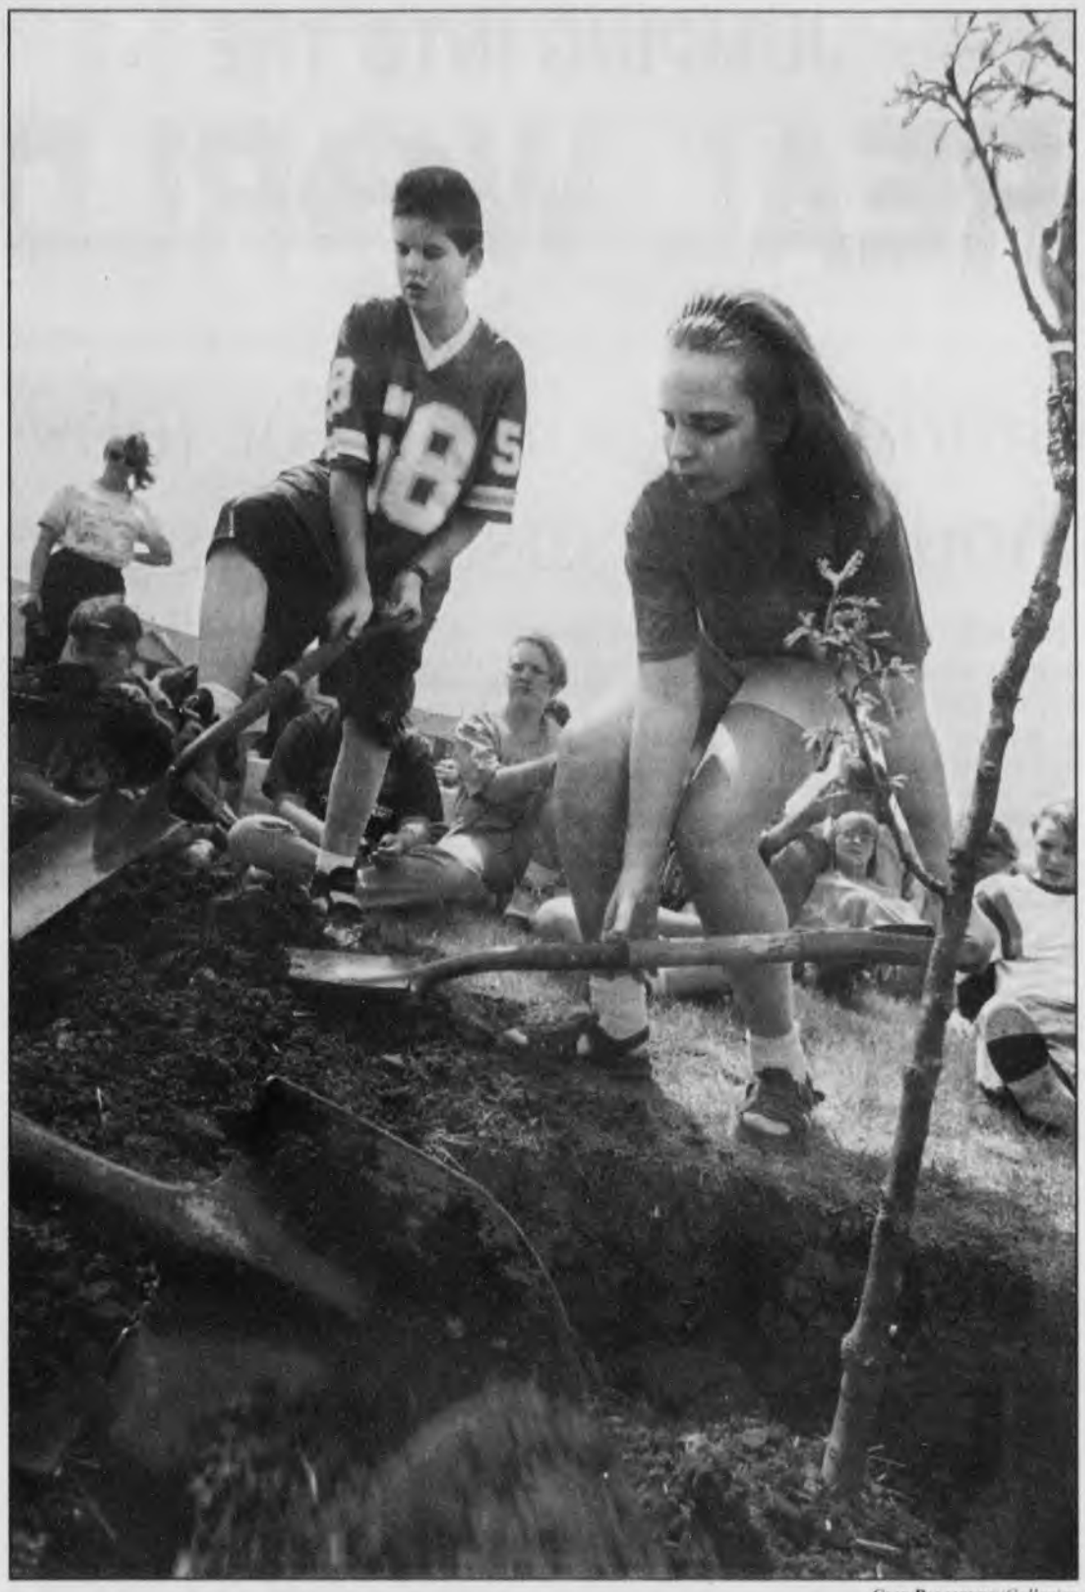
McClanathan said one of the two trees was donated by Friends of the Konza Prairie and the other was given by Karen Schmidt in memory of her father. Both were planted in front of the school

"I challenge you to pass on what you've learned," McClanathan said to students before the trees were planted. "With these trees, you have touched the future."

Jason Endacott, senior in elementary education and social-studies student teacher, said students will be able to look back on what they planted.

"We're planting them because in 30 years, they will be big trees that the kids can look back on and remember what they did in seventh grade," he said.

Wright said the growth of the trees is a process that the students can follow.



"The most important significance is that things don't come quickly — they have the wait," she said. "It is a good analogy for the way life is."

Robyn Johns, seventh-grade student, said she planted seeds for the grasses and plants and helped dig the hole for the tree.

"It's a great learning experience to see what different things are on the prairie," she said. "It's great for the land because we're putting back original grasses."

"WITH THESE TREES, YOU HAVE TOUCHED THE FUTURE."

JUMPING INTO THE REAL WORLD

Graduates looking for jobs should have distinct résumés

▶ RÉSUMÉ, COVER LETTER CRUCIAL IN APPLICATIONS FOR FUTURE EMPLOYMENT.

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

Graduation is less than one month away, and many seniors are working on their résumés in an effort to find that perfect job.

Inga Wilson, day shift manager at Copy Co., said she thinks business will pick up soon.

"We're busiest a couple weeks before graduation. Give it a couple weeks, and everyone will be coming in," she said.

But before making copies of résumés to send to prospective employers, students need to organize their experiences and activities into an attractive package.

Tony Catania, graduate assistant at Career and Employment Services, said a résumé needs to set the applicant apart from other job applicants.

"The whole idea is that you're competing against everyone that has that same education background," Catania said. "You need to look to skills developed through outside experiences and differentiate yourself using those. Outside skills, research you've done and projects are ways to set yourself apart."

He said there is hope for the graduates who were not involved heavily in extracurricular activities during college.

"Employers are looking for skill sets," he said. "Regardless of what someone thinks they do or do not have, they need to brainstorm for activities. Something that doesn't seem important at first may reveal hidden skills."

Once a résumé is completed, it is important to check it for errors. Tinsley Furry, coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center, said the biggest mistake she sees in résumés is not checking it for misspellings.

"Another mistake is not getting others to proof it. When a student reads their own résumé they often don't catch a lot of things," Furry said.

Another important tool in the application process is the cover letter. Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said sending a letter with your résumé allows you to give more specific information to a prospective employer.

"You never want to send a naked résumé," Schuley said. "A cover letter is very important because it is where you are able to specifically target a company and position. You can also summarize and make statements about your qualities."

Schuley said it is important to include the position in which you are interested and how you heard about it in the letter.

"They may be advertising more than one position, so it's important to state which position and how you learned about it. Name dropping really pays off," she said.

Another topic prospective employees should address in cover letters is what they want to happen next. Schuley said that although she wouldn't suggest students say they'll call back to schedule an interview, it is important they call back and discuss opportunities with a company.

"You need to follow up your contacts," she said. "Within two weeks you can call them and ask if they received it, if they foresee any openings or need any more information. Then within a month, you can follow up with a letter or short note."

Before sending a cover letter and résumé, it is important that they look as professional as possible. Both Kinko's Copies and Copy Co. have resources that can help students make a good first impression through the mail.

"We have résumé packages we can put together for students," Christi McElvain, project manager at Kinko's, said. "We can type your résumé on the computer and have different layouts for them. We also have résumé paper and pamphlets to help."

Copy Co. also has résumé packages available.

Both businesses offer packages that range from copies of a basic résumé to copies of a résumé and cover letter with envelopes. Both businesses also include the résumé on a disk in case changes need to be made.

"We can arrange it but do not actually write the résumé. You have to bring in something in your own words, and we will arrange it so it looks nice," Wilson said.

FOR MOST STUDENTS, PREPARING FOR JOB INTERVIEWS MEANS HAVING TO DRESS LIKE A GROWN-UP SO THEY CAN APPEAR PROFESSIONAL TO PROSPECTIVE EMPLOYERS. MARCIA SCHULEY, ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR OF CAREER AND EMPLOYMENT SERVICES, SAID JOB CANDIDATES MIGHT NEED TO CHANGE THEIR IMAGE A BIT BEFORE ENTERING THE MARKET.

Research necessary for interviews

▶ 'SELLING YOURSELF' IMPORTANT IN INTERVIEWS FOR POTENTIAL JOBS.

SARA ZENGER

Interviewing for a job can be quite stressful. But instead of worrying about what the employer wants to hear, one industry interviewer said students should simply relax and talk about their qualifications.

"Remember that you are selling yourself, talking about yourself," said Charles Coleman, Jr., director of human resources for the Hyatt Regent Crown Center. "As long as you tell the truth, you're going to be fine."

Coleman said confidence can make the difference in an interview.

"I think the key to the interview process for students is their ability to be confident in what could be a stressful situation. It's their ability to relate to the interviewer and relax in that environment," Coleman said.

Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said an interview is the time when a company decides if a prospective employee is a good match for their organization. Students' activities and backgrounds may get them the interview, but an interview is when they prove they can put their skills to work.

"A résumé is designed to get you to the interview. You can assume there will be three to five people that have the right degree, potential, right technical skills and background to do the job. So the interview gets to be subjective," Schuley said.

Many times, impressing an employer starts before the interview. Jim Blaauw, agricultural specialist at Management Recruiters, said being prepared for an interview is one of the most important steps students can take in their job searches.

Benefits package important in recruiting

▶ RETIREMENT PLANNING CANNOT START TOO SOON FOR COLLEGE GRADUATES.

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

Retirement plans might not seem important to a college graduate who is more than 40 years away from retiring.

But Joyce Cantrell, instructor in the College of Human Ecology, said retirement plans are among the benefits that should be considered before accepting a job offer.

"Looking at the health insurance given and making sure you have coverage is important. Also, consider retirement planning opportunities. The employer might kick in an amount, and the employee matches it," Cantrell said. "The opportunity to do retirement planning is important. They're predicting there won't be Social Security available."

Joe Younger, manager of benefits administration for human resource services at K-State, said there are several things to look for in a retirement plan.

"You want to find out how much are you going to contribute to it, is your employer going to contribute, how long are you going to work there, when you become the vested owner of it," Younger said.

"Also, consider what's the earliest age you can fully retire, and if you can retire with reduced income."

Jason Ellis, senior in agricultural journalism, said he looked for a combination of benefits when he accepted a job offer.

"I looked for health-care coverage, retirement and investment plans, and how much of it was shared between the employer and employee. It's also important to look at items like vacation time and time-off plans," Ellis said.

Ellis said he talked to recent graduates to find out what he should expect in a benefits package.

"I visited with others who had received offers and positions in the last year or two. After seeing what their packages and benefit plans were, I could compare to see if my offer was competitive in the market," Ellis said.

Younger said he suggests asking the employer for information on their benefit program.

"The best resource is whatever kind of published documents the employer has. When you ask for a job application, ask to see information on what kind of employment benefits are associated with the job," Younger said.

"This information is available, but you have to ask for it. It won't be published in a book in the library because it is changed constantly."

Piercings may decrease chance of finding job

SHELLY SLATIER

An official at Career and Employment Services said a student who has a facial piercing should consider removing it before an interview.

Marcia Schuley, associate director of CES, said it might be hard for the prospective employer to concentrate on the interview.

"I would encourage people to put their jewelry aside, at least until the job is secure," she said. "It's hard to take your eyes off something like that."

Schuley said the résumé is designed to get a job interview, and the interview is for employers to see how the person will fit into their work environment.

"So, if most people in the work place are wearing three-piece suits, it may well be a person with a facial piercing would not fit into that environment," Schuley said.

Susan Williams, assistant professor of sociology and criminology, said she got her nose pierced about eight years ago while attending the University of Connecticut. Williams said when she was getting ready to interview for jobs, the head of her department gave her the feeling he wanted her to take it out.

"On my first interview I forgot to take it out, and after we get to know each other a little more we talked about it on the way back to the airport," Williams said. "They said that is what attracted them to me, it showed my individuality."

Schuley said a facial piercing might be acceptable depending on where one works. She said the artistic field seems more accepting.

Players say fun rules in Ultimate Frisbee

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

Some say sports are to be played for fun. But with players in sports ranging from golf to football making millions annually, it can be difficult to believe they are playing for fun.

At least one sport has kept the principle of having fun as an integral part of the game: Ultimate Frisbee. K-State players of this sport said they believe in the spirit of the game.

"The main point of the game is to have fun. It's even written into the rules: 'Don't be a jerk,'" Nathan Peeke, junior in anthropology and psychology, and treasurer of K-State's Ultimate Frisbee team the Flying Dorothys.

The spirit of the game places the responsibility of fair play on each player according to the home page for the Ultimate Players Association, the governing body for ultimate Frisbee players in the United States. There are no referees, rather the players police themselves.

Ultimate Frisbee began in Maplewood, N.J., with some high school students playing the game on asphalt. The first intercollegiate game came four years later. Today, there are more than 25,000 players in the UPA and the World Flying Disc Federation in 35 countries, besides numerous casual players.

The game is similar to football: A point is scored when the disc is caught in the opponent's end zone. Besides the pull, which is similar to a kickoff, the similarities end there.

Once people catch a disc they are not allowed to move their pivot foot and no one is allowed to touch them. Play advances only by throwing the disc to one of the player's six teammates. A dropped or deflected pass turns the disc over to the other team. The winner is the first team to score 15 points.

"When we first started playing a couple of years back, we played barefoot and we didn't know the rules," Peeke said.

Both Peeke and T.J. Tomlin, junior in history and president of the Flying Dorothys, have similar stories as to how they began playing.

"A friend of mine asked me to play. I immediately loved the sport. I played basketball in high school, but I got the most incredible workout from Ultimate Frisbee," Tomlin said.

The Flying Dorothys have a squad of 30, but they always are welcoming new members to come out and play, Tomlin said. The team practices three times a week, but nothing is mandatory. The Dorothys practice at 6 p.m. Tuesdays and Thursdays in CiCo Park, and they practice at 2:30 p.m. on Sundays at Memorial Stadium.

"We usually throw the Frisbee around for a while, and then we play a game, which usually lasts about an hour and a half. We don't have stiff competition, but we try to play our best and to improve," Tomlin said.

The Flying Dorothys are composed of both men and women, college students and non-students.

This allows them to compete in both the college and club tournaments.

The squad usually goes to four or five tournaments a year, Peeke said. This year the squad went to tournaments in Baton Rouge, La., Fayetteville, Ark., Columbia, Mo., and Lawrence.

Online chat sessions provide interaction with authors

Places to surf

Here are some places for you to participate in online chat sessions between authors.

www.SimonSays.com
www.BarnesandNoble.com
www.amazon.com

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

It used to be, if people wanted to talk to their favorite author, they had to wait until the author showed up at their local bookstore for a book signing. However, chances were the fans lived too far away from any bookstore the author was visiting.

Problem solved — at least for those with Internet access. Now all fans have to do is go to the right site on the right night and their favorite author will answer their questions, right on their own computer screens.

Several sites offer author chats. Perhaps best known is www.BarnesandNoble.com. Barnes and Noble's World Wide Web site. Almost every night the site schedules a chat with a different author — sometimes two. The site has an archive of more than 400 chats with different authors.

During a chat session, participants submit questions to a moderator, who reads the questions to the author via telephone. The moderator then transcribes the author's answer for all to see. The questions and answers are displayed on a Web page that is refreshed about every minute.

Laurie Kuhn, a representative for BarnesandNoble.com, said the site tries to schedule a balance of fiction and nonfiction writers. Some of the most successful chats have been with authors Stanley Crouch, Joseph Heller, Nora Roberts and Charles Frazier, Kuhn said. Authors are not paid for chats, because chats are regarded as part of the publicity for their book.

An online chat has several benefits over an in-store appearance, Kuhn said.

"Online chats devote more time to audience questions. Online visitors can sign on from anywhere to participate. Also people are less inhibited online, which provides some interesting and stimulating questions. However, online chats may never replace in-store appearances because they are not as personal as actually meeting an author face-to-face and hearing him or her read," she said.

Kuhn said she thought the chats were useful for students, especially if it is a subject or author the students are covering.

The site has a biography for each visiting author, which includes material about the featured book as well as the author's background.

Angela Hubler, assistant professor of English, said talking to authors about their creative processes can help readers understand the final product.

"I think people often have the misconception that literature is written in a sort of artistic frenzy, or some kind of a creative dream state, and when you look at what authors write about, the creative process, it's a lot more like hard work," she said.

The chat landscape might even expand in the future, Kuhn said.

"We do believe that online chats will be more widespread in the future, since all signs point to the Web as the future of business as well as entertainment," she said.

Some authors might never appear on BarnesandNoble.com. The site only schedules authors it feels will draw an online attendance, Kuhn said.

Still, the benefits outweigh any negatives, Hubler said.

"I'm sure that for Barnes and Noble, this is just a marketing kind of scheme, but I think that people can get things out of it nevertheless," she said.

Legislature to conclude 1998 session

▶POSSIBLE ABORTION BILL VETO, DEBATE ABOUT KPERS BENEFITS MIGHT DELAY END OF SESSION.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Abortion, the most enduringly contentious issue of Kansas politics, could delay the Legislature's scheduled four-day wrap-up session opening on Wednesday.

It is not on the agenda as legislators return from a 2 1/2-week recess to conclude the work of the 1998 session, but abortion could reclaim the spotlight if Gov. Bill Graves vetoes a bill significantly toughening abortion restrictions. He was expected to make a decision late today.

"If the governor vetoes the abortion bill, the question will be whether there will be motivation to deal with that subject again," Senate President Dick Bond said.

Speaker Tim Shallenburger said there likely would be motions to override the veto, but said votes could be tough to come by in gaining the needed two-thirds majorities in both houses.

Failure to override could send pro-life legislators scurrying to amend the bill's provisions into some other measure, or Graves might spell out so specifically what he will accept that lawmakers could run a new bill.

If abortion doesn't delay adjournment — scheduled for Saturday — then another, almost equally controversial, issue might.

That issue is whether to provide retirees under the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System a cost-of-living increase in their pensions — although there were signs that issue might be defused.

The only thing leaders said the Legislature absolutely must do is pass the omnibus appropriations bill, the final, catchall funding measure of the session.

GRAVES

It includes spending authority for a variety of things that for one reason or another didn't get into the appropriations bills that went to Graves before the recess began on April 10.

However, given the emotions tied to abortion and providing retirees with their first pension increase in four years, there certainly will be more on the Legislature's plate than the omnibus bill this week.

"Obviously, the two main issues are the omnibus appropriations and KPERS," Bond said.

And possibly abortion.

"My advice is to veto the bill," Bond said he recommended to Graves.

"Whether you're pro-life or pro-choice or something in between, the bill is seriously flawed. The problem with the bill is it has had multiple authors that have inserted their pieces into the bill, and those pieces do not fit together."

For one thing, Bond said, the bill contains multiple definitions of what constitutes a viable fetus.

"If the governor vetoes the bill, I hope he will clearly state his areas of concern and what kind of legislation he can sign into law," Bond said.

Shallenburger said he doesn't think the abortion bill's alleged flaws constitute grounds for Graves to veto it.

"I believe that if the governor doesn't sign it, it won't be because of technical flaws," the speaker said.

"I think it will be for philosophical reasons.

"The bill brings the governor a lot closer to the pro-life position than he's comfortable with. I wish he would sign it, but he hasn't asked me. I think it would defuse the issue for a long time, and I think that's positive.

"I think the bill would stop the abortions that most people are trying to stop."

The bill would ban so-called partial-birth abortions, and remove from present state law "severe or life-threatening deformity or abnormality" as a reason for allowing late-term abortions. It also allows late-term abortions only if an abnormality or deformity would make it unlikely that a fetus could survive by any means after being born.

It is a removal of the fetal abnormality exception that might cause Graves the most concern.

The fuss about granting a pension increase to retired teachers, state employees, firemen and policemen centers on how much and what type.

Graves proposed a 3 percent one-time COLA for all retirees; the House approved a maximum 2 percent automatic annual COLA for all retirees, and the Senate passed a one-time 2 percent COLA only for those retired more than five years.

Both Bond and Shallenburger said they think the Legislature will end up passing something close to what Graves recommended.

But how to finance it could become a point of contention.

"I think the Senate will have some flexibility on it," Bond said. "I don't think any of us wants a prolonged veto session as we've experienced in the past over this issue."

"We can do the governor's plan without putting up any more money," said Shallenburger, referring to $28 million already included in the appropriations bill for a KPERS pension increase.

And the omnibus bill?

There is little controversial in it, but it could be held hostage by House conservatives if they need leverage to run a new abortion bill.

"If anybody thinks anything else is going to hang us up, they're wrong," Shallenburger said of his determination to end the session on Saturday.

"When we get these things done, and I've got 63 votes (a House majority for adjournment), we're gone."

Canadian leader to visit Cuba despite U.S. concern

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAVANA — With U.S. efforts to isolate Cuba flouted by its friends and foes alike, Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien headed to Havana on Sunday to build on his nation's growing ties with the communist-ruled island.

Chretien is one of the most important Western leaders to visit Cuba in years. His trip comes amid a string of victories in Cuba's efforts to break out of a U.S.-backed diplomatic isolation.

Canada, like many European and Latin American nations, favors a path of "constructive engagement," arguing that persuasion will be more effective in bringing change in Cuba.

"Of course we will raise the question of human rights and political rights," Chretien said before departing, according to the Canadian Press.

"Isolation leads nowhere. But if we are engaging them, discussing with them, offering help ... the people of Cuba and the president of Cuba will certainly be happy to have a dialogue."

U.S. officials said they disagree. But Canadian leaders insist the visit will have little impact on relations with the United States.

"They understand that we have a different position," Canada's Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy said.

Chretien will arrive at a symbol of Canada's growing role in Cuba: a Canadian-financed terminal at Havana's Jose Marti International Airport.

Canada rivals Italy as the largest supplier of foreign tourists to Cuba's famed beaches.

Its Sherritt International is the most prominent foreign company active in Cuba, with stakes in nickel mining, farming, cellular telephones and tourism. The company's executives have been banned from the United States in retaliation for use of mineral mines expropriated from U.S. companies after Fidel Castro's 1959 revolution.

Cuba has long been one of the most visible points of difference between Canada and the United States.

In 1976, then-Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau visited Cuba and infuriated anti-communists with a cry of "Viva Castro."

Canada and Mexico — the two U.S. partners in the North American Free Trade Area — are the only countries in the Americas that never broke relations with Cuba.

Several Latin American and Caribbean countries have re-established ties with Havana since the end of the Cold War and the disappearance of Cuban-backed efforts to foment revolution abroad.

The Dominican Republic this month renewed full diplomatic relations. The foreign ministers of Mexico and Brazil plan to visit soon. Several countries are pressing for Cuba's readmission to the Organization of American States.

Justin Hall damaged by Sunday night fire

Fire department estimates rate the structural damage at $35,000. Damage to the contents of the two rooms totaled $34,500.

Nutrition professor Kathy Grunewald was working when alarms sounded.

She said she had just checked some of the labs for fire after smelling smoke, but found nothing.

"We smelled something in the hallway about 10 to 15 minutes before the alarms went off, but we went and checked the labs where the students were working and nothing was on — no ovens or burners," she said.

Snyder said the initial call came from K-State Police, who reported that the fire alarm in Justin had been activated. When crews arrived, Snyder said they first noticed smoke pouring from another area of the building.

"When we arrived, there was smoke coming out on the west side of the building because it was going through the ventilation," he said.

Dean of human ecology Barbara Stowe said both rooms will be closed indefinitely, which could displace as many as 12 students.

"You don't want this at any time of year, but this is especially hard when people are trying to finish their projects," she said.

Stowe said smoke damage from the fire could affect rooms throughout the building, but only time will tell how many other rooms were damaged.

Snyder said official repair estimates haven't been obtained, but he said he thought both rooms are a total loss.

at a school event, but they haven't been used often.

"I don't recall our using them at all this school year," he said.

Seymour said pocketknives have been found in his students' possession on occasion, but those are about the most dangerous of any item found.

Metal detectors at Anthony Middle School have been discussed as a possibility by Seymour and the Manhattan school board, but he said there hasn't seemed to be a need for them.

Benson said he's certainly concerned about what happens at other schools in the country, but as for his school, he said he has to trust that students are of good character and act as they're taught, to respect others.

"We're still optimistic, and we can't operate out of fear," he said.

year and 10 on television.

"I like to stay at home," he said. "It's fairly rare that I go out on a personal appearance. There is a waiting list of about 2,400 stores."

Rebecca Kastner, staff member of the Country Gift Shop, said the shop had been writing Lowenthal for the past three years.

"We wrote him every month, sent pictures of what we were doing with the Boyds Bear Collection and sent petitions signed by several hundred customers," she said.

Kathy Cochran, Olathe, Kan., said she got to Manhattan at about 9:30 a.m. even though the signing wasn't scheduled to start until noon. She said she wanted to make sure she got a Boyds piece signed. Cochran has been collecting Boyds Bears since her daughter took her to the Country Gift Shop last October.

Sandra Koch, owner of Second Love gift store in Emporia, Kan., came to get a bear signed for herself and for her daughter. She said she sells the collection at her business, but usually only buys select pieces.

"I heard through my customers that he (Lowenthal) was coming," she said. "They were really excited."

Claudette Laurie, owner of the Country Gift Shop, said her staff also was excited. Collectors from across the country called the store after hearing about the visit on a home shopping network, she said.

"We've gotten calls from about every state," she said. "He mentioned on QVC that he was coming to Manhattan. That's when phone calls started coming in."

Many collectors had Laurie sign her name to the plush bear named Claudette.

In order to get a bear signed by Lowenthal, collectors had to call ahead of time to get a number so there wouldn't be chaos at Sunday's event.

Lowenthal said 2,000 people tried to get his signature at a Chicago event, but he only had time to sign about 400 collectibles.

"People were disappointed, got upset and started knocking down barricades," he said.

During the signing, the Country Gift Shop presented 60 plush bears valued at $1,000 to the Riley Country Police Department bear patrol, which uses the bears to comfort children who are victims of crime or accidents.

On Saturday, the Elizabeth "I am the Queen" Boyds Bear figurine was for sale at the Country Gift Shop for that day only. Last year, collectors were able to buy the king for one day only.

Collectible bears created on Maryland kitchen table

After a few years in the antique business, Lowenthal said he wanted to make affordable antique collectibles.

"I got tired of standing in snow waiting for antiques," he said.

Lowenthal began painting duck decoys, and in 1982, he bought his first antique bear to paint.

"That's how we got started — off the kitchen table," he said. "We are the longest-running overnight success in the bear business. The harder we work, the luckier we get."

Lowenthal said he did not want his collection to be just a fad. When the Boyds collection began, Lowenthal said his brother, who is in the sock business, seemed to have a more secure line of work. Lowenthal said everyone always needs socks.

"I remember wishing it was more like my brother's business and that it wouldn't go away in 18 months," he said.

Lowenthal said he gets many of his ideas for the collection designs from watching his 10-year-old daughter, Bailey, and 13-year-old son, Matthew. He said just watching others gives him ideas.

Though many of his ideas come from his children, Lowenthal said they aren't that crazy about the Boyds Bear collection pieces.

"They like it, and they like being on TV," he said, "but since they're really more for adults to give to adults, they're not that interested in them."

Lowenthal said he also gets some of his ideas from everyday things he does himself.

One of the bear collectibles came from Lowenthal's hobby of gardening. He said he had a sunflower in his garden that grew quite tall, so he designed one of his bear figurines holding a tall sunflower.

Lowenthal said he has a favorite bear each year, but his favorite of the stoneware collection is a piece called "We Are Always the Same Age Inside."

He said the piece was made for his mother.

"On her 80th birthday, I asked her how it felt to be 80 and she said, 'You know I still feel 17 inside,'" Lowenthal said.

Interviews often depend on research

"Know your company. Do your research before the interview. It's so easy to do it now because every company you talk to has a page on the Internet," Blaauw said.

Schuley said preparation should go beyond gathering basic information.

"Sometimes people spend too much time reading manuals and financial reports. If you interview with a newspaper you have to read that paper," Schuley said.

Another part of preparation is making sure you look your best. Schuley said this could mean changing your image a little.

"New graduates should look at people who graduated last year and are now on the other side. They have usually changed their hairstyle and how they dress. You want to look like that," Schuley said.

Schuley said this could mean adding a few items to your wardrobe, but new clothes always should be worn before the interview to make sure they are comfortable.

During the interview, prospective employers should be ready to explain their past working experiences.

"I want to see not only if they've done the job, but if they've been successful in doing the job. What have they done, have they been successful, how they became successful," Blaauw said.

Another area interviewees are often asked about is their strengths and weaknesses. Blaauw said the best way to handle this question is to be honest.

"Usually a person has no problem with strengths. Then when I ask about weaknesses, they can't think of anything. We all have weaknesses. As long as a person knows that, not only what they are but what they're doing to correct them, it's OK," Blaauw said.

However, much of the time it's not what you say but how you say it that counts. Schuley said enthusiasm is one of the most important qualifications a job candidate can have.

"Having a sparkle in your eye and smiling is important," Schuley said.

Piercings can factor into hiring for jobs

"The artistic field has a more ready acceptance of piercings," she said. "But when you move into banks, accounting and engineering, what is considered appropriate is different."

Tanna Ewy, of the human resources department of Commerce Bank in Wichita, said she would tell people up front during the interview that they might be asked to remove the jewelry during working hours if they are hired.

"It would depend on the position, but in most banking positions that kind of paraphernalia is not acceptable," she said.

Ewy said if a person came to the interview wearing facial jewelry, she still would consider hiring them.

"I guess it's a personal choice if they choose to do that, and I wouldn't want to pass judgment when they might be the most capable applicant," Ewy said.

Karen Lauseng, former interim director for Manhattan Arts Center, said if the job requires people to meet and greet the public, she would prefer they not have any piercings in order to present a professional image.

"Ear piercing is not a problem, and that's fine, but it is when you get into eyebrows, lips, chin and nose is where the public is concerned," she said.

Williams said that when she came to interview at K-State she took her nose ring out because she didn't want to take any chances.

"I perceived people here in the Midwest to be conservative, so I took it out," she said.

"But, I wear it now and people accept that."

Campus police empty Union, Rec after bomb threat

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Student Union and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex temporarily were evacuated Monday after K-State Police received word of a bomb threat. Both buildings were reopened after a search yielded no evidence of a bomb.

Cheryl May, director of News Services, said both buildings were evacuated at about 1:15 p.m., just moments after campus police were notified of the threat.

"The original bomb threat was phoned to Dara's Fast Lane," May said. "They notified Riley County Police, who then notified K-State Police."

May said both buildings were evacuated because there was confusion as to where the bomb supposedly was located.

"They were told that there was either a bomb in the Rec or in the Union Bookstore," May said.

"'Rec' could have meant either the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex or the recreational area of the Union, so both buildings were evacuated."

K-State called the Riley County bomb technician to help with the search.

The Rec Complex was closed for less than an hour and was reopened after campus police and staff members searched the building and found no signs of a bomb.

"We did a search of the building along with campus police. We didn't find anything, and we were given the okay to reopen, so we reopened at about 2:00," said Steve Martini, associate director of Recreational Services.

May said the search wouldn't have lasted as long as it did, but several of the specialists had to travel all the way from Fort Riley to help.

"The reason it took so long to reopen is that it took the people from Fort Riley about 30 minutes to get here," May said.

▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board says all parties should err on the side of caution in such a scare.

She said these specialists were called in to assist campus police in their search as soon as the threat was reported.

"The caller said the bomb was in either a red or black bag. There were red and black backpacks found at the Union, so each of those had to be searched," she said.

While police and Union officials were searching the building, Union employees were stationed at each entrance to inform people of the threat and to keep them from entering the building.

This appeared to pose a safety risk, but John Lambert, head of the department of Public Safety, said because the situation wasn't understood fully, Union officials dealt with the threat as best they could.

"The police recommend evacuating the building," Lambert said. "Then they do a search along with a regular occupant of the building and look for anything unusual. But there are just too many scenarios to know exactly what to do in each one."

Martini explained what he thought was the best philosophy when dealing with unique situations such as this one.

"You have to take them all seriously. We have to be concerned about the safety of the participants," he said.

No arrests have been made in the case, but the Riley County Police Department is working with campus police to find the person or people responsible for the incident. Campus police were unavailable for comment about what progress had been made in the case.

Leak causes Dow to slide under 9,000

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Stocks plunged Monday, with the Dow Jones industrial average sliding as much as 224 points as investors bristled at an apparent hint that the Federal Reserve might try to slow the economy to protect against inflation.

A late burst of bargain hunting trimmed the day's losses, leaving the Dow 146.98 points lower at 8,917.64, the famed barometer's first close at less than 9,000 in two weeks.

The broad market suffered sharper losses, with the technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index tumbling 2.6 percent in value.

"This is a markdown on all stocks," said Ronald J. Hill, investment strategist at Brown Brothers Harriman & Co., suggesting that investors have grown defensive after three months of record-setting gains. "Any time you get this much of a gain in a quarter, people think about taking some profits and look for a reason."

Notably, even after Monday's slide, the Dow still was up nearly 13 percent in 1998.

The selloff was triggered by a report in The Wall Street Journal saying Fed officials are no longer pondering a cut in the central bank's key lending rates to offset the economic drag of the fiscal crisis in Asia.

Graves approves tight restrictions of abortion bill

▶ GOVERNOR SIGNS BILL OUTLAWING PARTIAL-BIRTH ABORTIONS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves on Monday signed into law a controversial bill that would impose tighter restrictions on late-term abortions and ban so-called partial-birth abortions.

"The issue of abortion is one of the most difficult and divisive issues in public policy. It divides friends and family and embodies medical science and care, religion, ethics, morality and law," Graves said in a statement sent to legislators.

GRAVES

"Life is sacred. The challenge is balancing the constitutional rights and the mental and physical needs of the mother with those of the fetus," the governor said.

The new law bans so-called partial-birth abortions and removes from current statutes "severe or life-threatening deformity or abnormality" as a reason for allowing late-term abortions. It also allows late-term abortions only if an abnormality or deformity would make it unlikely a fetus could survive by any means after birth.

Graves said, based on his conversations with physicians, he believes extremely few, if any, women will be forced to carry such a fetus full-term.

The bill makes Kansas the 27th state to enact a ban on partial-birth abortions.

Union enhancement project scheduled to begin by June

▶ CONSTRUCTION DELAYED UNTIL MAY COMMENCEMENT, VISITATIONS COMPLETED.

WYNN DALTON
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Student Union enhancement project is one step closer to the start of construction.

Union Director Bernard Pitts announced the sale of the bond that will fund the renovation project at Monday's Union Governing Board meeting, and said construction should begin by June 1.

Pitts said the 20-year bond was purchased by the Prudential Group at an interest rate of 5.019 percent.

Pitts said he anticipates the bond to be paid off before the 20-year deadline.

"My hope is that with the projected enrollment increase over the next 10 to 15 years, we'll be able to pay off that bond earlier than 20 years," Pitts said.

Each full-time student contributes $23.50 each semester to the project through a student privilege fee for Union enhancement.

Pitts said the sale of the bond was the final aspect in the process of getting the renovation started.

The general contractor, McPherson Contractors of Topeka, also is working to complete renovation to Manhattan City Hall. Pitts said construction was delayed until after spring commencement to accommodate visitors.

Safety aspects of the plan will be first on the construction time line and are expected to continue through the fall semester. Those changes include improvements to fire and sprinkler systems. The second aspect, renovation of the ballroom and the K, S and U rooms, won't occur until January 1999.

Other parts of the renovation, including the planned food court and renovation of the K-State Union Bookstore, will extend well into the year 2000.

Though the renovation is expected to be under way by June, Pitts said there are still two remaining bids to go out — one for food service equipment and one for the plaza north of the Union, which is the last aspect of the project. Those parts of the project should total $1 million.

UGB also reviewed the Union budget for fiscal year 1999, and recommended the budget be sent to the Union's corporate board for approval. UGB members encouraged the board to review specific items, including a projected $72,007 deficit incurred by the new Wildcat ID Card.

The campus card operation was intended to be self-sufficient within five years of the change in the ID card format. But the card center is projected to lose at least $19,288 by the end of fiscal year 1998 with the $72,007 loss projected for the following year.

UGB President Patrick Carney said he is concerned with the deficit the Union incurs by operating the campus card and the possible loss of revenue generated by the system. Several campus agencies benefit from the card's new format, which features a database of student's current information. Though many departments use the ID cards, Carney said the Union foots the bill — and absorbs the debt.

"If the athletic department is benefiting by using the ID card, if the Rec center is benefiting by using the ID card, if we are benefiting from using the ID card, if Commerce Bank is benefiting from using the ID card, then we should all be equal players in all of this," Carney said. "We should all shoulder the $72,000 debt."

Board members also were concerned about projected losses for the Union's food service. The service is projected to lose $135,578 for fiscal year 1998, and $152,541 in fiscal year 1999.

After an executive session to discuss the department's projected losses, the board recommended the budget be sent to the corporate board for further review.

ID CARDS HIT HARD

The Union Governing Board is encouraging the Union corporate board to review a projected $72,007 deficit incurred from the new Wildcat ID Cards. While many campus departments use the ID cards, the Union is the only agency that absorbs the debt.

"WE SHOULD ALL SHOULDER THE $72,000 DEBT."

Men more likely to die of heart disease according to New York professor's data

After leaving K-State in 1981 to study the biological, behavioral and psychosocial risk factors of coronary heart disease, Gerdi Weidner returned to the Department of Psychology on Friday to tell listeners why women are less likely than men to get heart disease.

Her research focuses on the behavioral and psychosocial factors of coronary heart disease.

"The psychology department invited Gerdi back to talk about her research," Chuck Thompson, professor of psychology, said. "Two years ago she said she'd love to come back and talk about her research, so we invited her."

Weidner spoke to a group of students and faculty in Bluemont Hall about her research findings.

"From age 45 all the way up to 74, men are at a higher risk of having heart disease than women," Weidner said. "And from 1962 till 1994, women's life expectancy has increased while men's has decreased."

Weidner said there are many risk factors that might determine risk for heart disease, but she hasn't found a link as to why more men get heart disease.

"Biological risk factors such as cholesterol, history of heart disease and diabetes and behavioral risk factors such as smoking and extreme alcohol, plus psychosocial risk factors such as job stress, all play a role in heart disease," she said. "But we couldn't tell why there's a difference in gendering of heart disease."

In one study Weidner said researchers focused on job stress.

"We found that working men and homemakers have higher cholesterol than working women," she said. "Employed women are generally in better health than homemakers."

Weidner said women aren't dying of heart disease but of breast cancer and respiratory cancer.

"Women don't ever see themselves as ever having heart attacks," she said. "They are more concerned with breast cancer, which not many men get."

Students said they found her research findings interesting.

"I came to listen to her for my public-speaking analysis," said Anne Bartholomees, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine. "The information was really cool, and some of it was hard to follow, but it was very interesting."

Weidner, who now works in the Department of Psychology at the State University of New York at Stony Brook, came from Germany in 1976.

She earned a degree from Justus Liebig Universitaet in Germany and received her doctorate from K-State in 1981.

Weidner has been a visiting scientist at the Karolinska Institute in Stockholm and at the National Institutes of Health.

Reenactment group shows true meaning of Confederate flag after boy suspended

WICHITA — In what organizers called a polite protest of the suspension of a middle school student because he drew a Confederate flag, a reenactment group marched and performed a salute in Civil War gear to show the boy what the flag means.

T.J. West, 13, of Derby, Kan., was suspended April 14 for three days after another student dared him to draw a Confederate flag and then took the drawing to a teacher.

District policy prohibits "racially divisive" material in school and includes the Confederate flag as an example.

On Sunday, the boy and his father, Terry West, watched as members of the Sons of the Confederate Veterans acted out a ceremony at a Wichita cemetery.

"We want T.J. to know the real history of the flag," said John Handley, a leader of the reenactment group. "We want him to learn the war was not about race, but about how our nation would be governed."

Handley said the school board's policy that lists the Confederate flag among symbols of racist groups was an insult to veterans.

"The flag represents heritage, not hate," he said. "We display it to express pride in our Southern heritage and to honor the memory of our ancestors who fought on the side of the South in the war between the states."

Superintendent Dennis Shoemaker last week defended the school's policy.

"It is a good policy that has helped to temper racial tensions and has helped to dramatically curb racial incidents," he said.

West was scheduled to speak Monday evening before the USD 260 Board of Education about the district's Racial Harassment and Intimidation Policy.

County judge sentences man to death for beating, killing 81-year-old woman

COLUMBIA, Mo. — A halfway house walk-away who beat and suffocated an 81-year-old woman pleaded for his life before a judge Monday but found no sympathy.

Boone County Judge Ellen Roper called Bernard Rhodes' actions vicious and in no way accidental. She sentenced him to death for the murder and to life in prison for ransacking his victim's house.

"I really don't know what to say, but I'm very sorry for what I done," Rhodes, shackled and crying, told the judge during his sentencing hearing Monday.

Rhodes, 39, was convicted in March of savagely attacking Dorothy Martin in July 1997 and leaving her to die on the kitchen floor of her home.

Martin's older sister discovered the body. Both hands and legs were bound, a tablecloth was thrown over her head and a plastic bag had been tied around her throat.

Rhodes had been serving a five-year sentence on a drug conviction and walked away from a Kansas City halfway house about two weeks before the slaying. He was visiting a home across the street from Martin's the day he attacked her.

Defense attorneys argued Rhodes planned only to steal from Martin to buy crack cocaine and that he didn't mean to kill her.

"It wasn't intended," Rhodes said. "I fell to my knees when I found out (from police) the victim was dead."

Boone County prosecutor Kevin Crane said Martin's injuries were astounding in number and shocking in their brutality.

Defense lawyer Kim Shaw asked Roper to show mercy and said her client had attempted to take responsibility by seeking a plea bargain in exchange for a life sentence.

"The way this particular death occurred was very, very vicious, and it's incredible to me to believe it was an accident," Roper said before passing sentence. "Ms. Martin had a right not to leave this life in the way she did."

After Roper formally sentenced Rhodes to death, a death-penalty opponent disrupted the courtroom in protest.

Jeff Stack of Fellowship for Reconciliation told Roper she had no moral grounds to order capital punishment. He accused the judge, the prosecutor and the spectators of participating in murder before a bailiff escorted him out.

TEXTBOOK TRAUMA

Students may struggle with textbook system

Eric Stranghoner, senior in landscape architecture, bought a $100 textbook for one of his classes at K-State. At the end of the semester, he took it back to the K-State Union Bookstore and received $20 for its return.

"I think the bookstores are getting really rich," Stranghoner said.

The price of textbooks is an issue among college students. But what goes into the cost of textbooks? Most students would say publishers and bookstores are making excessive profits. But while inflation continues to affect the economy, the prices of textbooks will increase.

According to Union Bookstore records, in fall 1994 the average Analytical Geometry and Calculus I textbook was $81.95. Now students pay $99.25 for the same book, because of inflation and the elaborate nature of books today.

Another factor in the cost of books is the cost of paper. Irene Ward, director of expository writing in theDepartment of English, said the price of the grade of paper used to make most textbooks has gone up 40 percent from several years ago.

"My understanding is that the rise in price is due to the rise in paper," Ward said.

If the cost of books continues to increase at the same rate, by the year 2002, students will pay $116.55 for the math textbook.

Every time publishers send a new edition of books to the Union Bookstore the prices increase, said Carrie Mitchell, book division manager for the bookstore.

"With today's technology, you've got to have a book that's going to grab a student," Mitchell said. "You can't just have simple pictures."

Mitchell said textbooks are made to grab students' attention by design. They have more graphics and are of higher quality than they used to be. Along with the textbooks, publishers send supplemental materials to faculty, including tests, lecture notes, video tapes and diskettes. These additional materials sent to the faculty are incorporated into the price of a book, and they usually increase the cost of books for students.

Students can buy used books, but some students don't sell their books, Mitchell said. Students like to keep the books with more technical research to use as future references in their jobs, she said.

Dana Bailey, textbook buyer for the bookstore, said faculty often are made to write new editions of books regardless of whether new editions are necessary.

"Some faculty members have stipulations in their contracts where every so many years they have to come out with a new edition to a book, even though there might not be any new information," she said.

Ray Kurtz, professor and chair of elementary education, said he doesn't like making his students buy expensive books.

"I anguish over the prices of textbooks," he said.

A couple of years ago, Kurtz chose a textbook for his class. The publishing company packaged and sent a two-volume set, but his class didn't need one of the volumes.

"They won't sell you what you want," he said. "It's ridiculous — it borders on dishonesty."

Kurtz said companies come out with a new edition only by slightly changing the old edition. The old editions are no longer available for buybacks or selling.

"It's a marvelous way for textbook companies to throw away books if you have to buy a new edition," he said.

He said the bookstores have students' best interests in mind, but bookstores are helpless to change the current system.

"What if all the cars we are driving now all became obsolete, and tomorrow if you want a car you have to buy a 1998 car?" he said. "What would that do to our economy?"

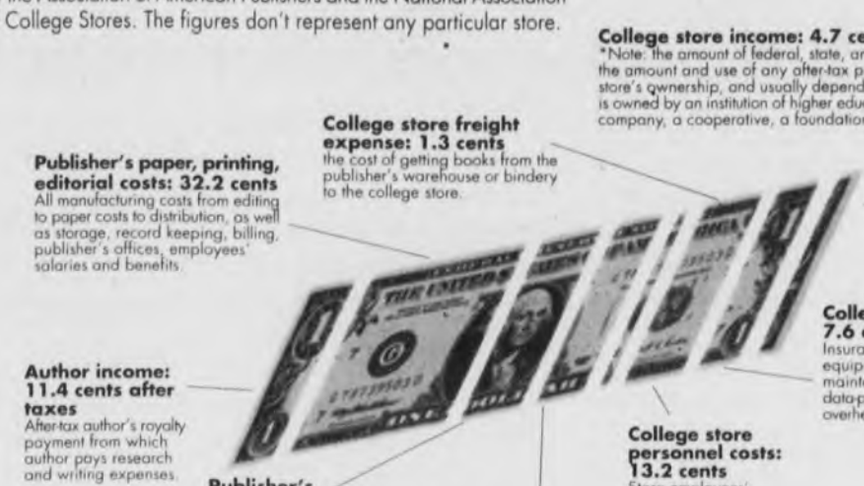
Often, students who are required to buy new editions of textbooks every semester share books with other students enrolled in the same classes. A few students have even bought books before a final exam and afterward returned them at full price.

"Books are an investment in your future, you don't buy them because they are fun," Mitchell said. "It's a difficult thing to do. How do you measure $68.50 in a book?"

Data from 1994 to 1995 gathered by the Association of American Publishers and the National Association of College Stores report the cost of a textbook is based on the following: the author's income; publisher's paper, printing and editorial costs; publisher's marketing costs; publisher's general and administrative taxes; publisher's income after taxes; and the college store income, operations, personnel and freight expenses.

According to the video "The Great Textbook Rip-off: Fact or Fiction?," produced by the College Stores Research and Educational Foundation, the average college bookstore makes a profit of 25 cents per dollar.

"I suppose in any retail business, if you want to stay in business, you need to try and set reasonable pricing markets," said Dan Walter, textbook manager at Varney's Book store in Aggieville. "For us at Varney's, we pay rental, utilities and staffing. There is quite a bit of overhead that goes into the price of goods we sell."



Walter said the market demands high-quality, full-color textbooks, and the production of these books can be expensive and time-consuming.

"As long as I can remember, college students are on tight budgets," he said. "But I found that if a teacher is making good use of a good textbook and testing over it, then students are still buying those books."

How the bookstore uses your dollar

All figures are averages based on 1994-95 financial data gathered by the Association of American Publishers and the National Association of College Stores. The figures don't represent any particular store.

Publisher's paper, printing, editorial costs: 32.2 cents
All manufacturing costs from editing to paper costs to distribution, as well as storage, record keeping, billing, publisher's offices, employees' salaries and benefits.

College store freight expense: 1.3 cents the cost of getting books from the publisher's warehouse or bindery to the college store.

College store income: 4.7 cents pre-tax*
*Note: the amount of federal, state, and/ or local tax, and therefore the amount and use of any after-tax profit, is determined by the store's ownership, and usually depends on whether the college store is owned by an institution of higher education, a contract management company, a cooperative, a foundation or by private individuals.

College store operations: 7.6 cents
Insurance, utilities, building and equipment rental and maintenance, accounting and data-processing charges and other overhead paid by college students.

Author income: 11.4 cents after taxes
After-tax author's royalty payment from which author pays research and writing expenses.

Publisher's marketing costs: 13.8 cents
Marketing, advertising, promotion, publisher's field staff, professors' free copies.

Publisher income: 11.4 cents after taxes
After-tax income from which the publisher pays for a new product development, author advances, market research and dividends to stockholders.

College store personnel costs: 13.2 cents
Store employees' salaries and benefits to handle ordering, receiving, pricing, shelving, cashiers, customer service, refund desk and sending extra textbooks back to the publisher.

Alternatives could bring down prices

▶DISCOUNTS COULD COME FROM PACKETS, NETWORKING, BOOKSTORE PROFIT CUTS.

Before purchasing expensive textbooks, professors and students weigh the importance of textbook information and its price.

James Urban, associate professor of microbiology, said his required text is expensive but is the best book on the market. Even though Urban doesn't lecture from the textbook, he said if students want to be successful in microbiology, they need double exposure from the text and in-class lecture. Urban also puts all his lecture notes on the World Wide Web so students always have access to the information.

"I don't think students realize how time-consuming it is to put all that information on the computer," he said. "Students have access without a fee or copy costs. It's a tremendous savings."

Research is currently being done at K-State to start a World Wide Web book-swap, a site that allows students to buy and sell books, but there are still questions as to how the thousands of books could be categorized and continuously updated.

Carrie Mitchell, book division manager for the K-State Union Bookstore, said the site might hurt business at the bookstore.

"Ultimately the site would hurt us, but we're offering to help," she said. "Part of our mission is to be of service to the students, not to rip them off like everyone thinks."

With only two bookstores in town, Beth Saylor, junior in finance and marketing, said she thinks there is a monopoly. She said she often shares books with other students.

"My friends and I do a little networking," Saylor said. "Friends are willing to pay more for the book than the bookstore, if I sold the book back. But my friends are also saving more money than if they had to buy the book from the bookstore."

She said she likes the book system Highland Community College set up for students. The community college allows students to rent their textbooks for classes, and the rental cost is included in their tuition.

Josh Jones, senior in English education, said he paid $90 for an English book needed for one class.

"I think it's a monopoly with bookstores, because they know we have to have these books," Jones said. "If the bookstores would take a cut in profit, they could offer savings to kids."

He said he usually sits through class for a few weeks to make sure he needs to buy a book. Sometimes he waits until the class reads or talks about the book, then he checks it out from the library.

He said his professor tries to help the situation by making packets of literature so he doesn't have to buy anthologies.

"It saved me about $40," he said.

Some K-State professors ask publishers to condense parts of books and shrink-wrap the parts into informational packets, rather than professors making their own packets in copy centers.

This process helps avoid breaking copyright laws.

Irene Ward, director of expository writing in the English department, said that while most departments cannot utilize custom publishing, the Department of English can. Because the department uses thousands of books for many students each semester, the department is able to take advantage of the services and volume discount offered by the publishing companies.

"PART OF OUR MISSION IS TO BE OF SERVICE TO THE STUDENTS, NOT TO RIP THEM OFF LIKE EVERYONE THINKS."
CARRIE MITCHELL, BOOK DIVISION MANAGER FOR K-STATE UNION BOOKSTORE

Bomb-threat evacuation requires better planning

A Monday afternoon bomb threat evacuated the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex for an hour and the K-State Student Union for three hours but did not stop students and employees from standing near the doors.

There's little point of evacuating the buildings if students are allowed to stand right outside the windows and entrances. The campus streets closest to the buildings and an area of at least 10 feet around the doors should have been blocked off. The on-site response of more emergency vehicles, including a fire engine, and barriers would have served as a caution and informed the campus of a possible threat.

The K-State Police and Riley County Police Department, as always, took this bomb threat seriously. But, it's not enough to evacuate the buildings long enough to conduct a search. There has to be the highest level of caution for the surrounding areas during a bomb threat.

Theoretically, if a building full of concrete and mortar such as the Union did have a bomb, the damage to windows and walls of surrounding buildings could be significant.

In this case, a suspicious bag was found in the Union, and bomb technicians were called in. This discovery raised the stakes another level, and additional precautions should have been taken. If the situation is serious enough to close the center of campus for three hours, students should have been made more aware of the dangers.

Thank you for evacuating both buildings and conducting a thorough search. However, let's take this a step further.

The students and employees on this campus cannot operate in an environment of fear. But improving the precautions to ensure an additional level of safety would not be a great imposition. In fact, it could save lives.

The act of calling in a false bomb threat is foolish and criminal. It also wastes time and creates an unnecessary environment of alarm. However, it's important to understand that no community is exempt from violence, and all precautions should be taken.

Microsoft's stranglehold on software industry leaves columnist with doubts: Can Gates play fair?

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

Ken is a senior in computer science. You can send e-mail to Ken at sigma7@ksu.edu

Some friends of mine from Ohio are investing in a new computer and asked a mailing list to which we belong for advice. Questions followed about RAM, CD, DVD, modems, processor speed, Zip drives, etc. A note from Peoria, Ill., advised, "Now, Zip drives. I would go against them, unless being compatible with the rest of the world is something that's important to you."

I immediately directed our agent in Peoria to buy an Amiga.

Time was when yours truly was a believer in that sad old system. Don't get me wrong; it was capable of performing graphic miracles and actually multitasking — doing several things simultaneously. It had its faults, no more than any other system. But in the end, I had to make the transition, because I couldn't find software. Everything was PC- and Mac-ready. A computer without software is a calculator, nothing more or less.

Now I have a PC running (sigh) Windows 95. Now, did Bill Gates pistol-whip me until I double-clicked on the "install" icon? No. I could be running a PC in a DOS environment. Then again, I could crawl to campus on my elbows.

Run down to your software store (no, it's all right, go ahead and leave class; they're not talking about anything that's going to be on the final anyway, trust the columnist). See how many of those programs require Windows. If any of them don't cost more than a roll of film, call me here at the Collegian, will you?

Can you find a computer that isn't running Windows in some form or another? Certainly, this column and this newspaper is birthed from a clique of Macs hiding somewhere in the bowels of Kedzie Hall, but they are the minority. There are Sun workstations and clusters of Windowed PCs in the public labs across campus. According to The Seattle Times (and they wouldn't lie to me), about 90 percent of the world's computers run under Windows.

Again, there's no force involved here. The coercion up to this point has been the existence of a graphical user interface that allows much greater versatility than a standard DOS shell. Then again, communicating via goose honks in Morse code is a step above DOS. This was Microsoft's success; creating a product that made life better and easier, and bully for them.

Where did they go wrong? Pretty much everywhere since then. Windows 95 (which I got via UPS two minutes before the O.J. Simpson verdict on a sublime afternoon) was touted to usher in a new age of compatibility and end the outta-the-blue crashes. Now, instead of the occasional Valujet Everglades moment, I get the TWA mid-flight fireball: a dialogue box with two options: one that doesn't work and a second that promptly reboots my system. Super.

Then there's the bundled software. Microsoft's word processor doesn't keep the people at Corel up at nights, but the Internet Explorer program is the headline-grabber. Bill Gates insists it's an integral part of Windows 95. Does anyone out there whose paychecks aren't signed by a Microsoft subsidiary actually believe this tripe? I don't remember the UPS guy handing me Internet Explorer. What's happened is that Microsoft was blindsided by the exploitability of the Internet and is looking to sink its hooks into an astronomically growing market through any means necessary.

Sometime after rival browser-manufacturer Netscape's stock success, Microsoft changed tactics. Its goal, as it should be, is still the same: make money money money. Its methods have gone from the passive (create the most advanced graphic interface for PC-compatible computers and let the public come) to the active (insist they take the Internet Explorer if they want to run Windows), and it might be willing to make the Justice Department draw the line on how far it can strongarm its software.

If you're running Windows 95, though, don't let the Microsoft lobbyist convince you that you must have Internet Explorer or your PC will neuter your pets and redecorate the den in your sleep. It's as integral a part of Windows as your blender. Windows 98, though, will be a critter of a different feather; advance word is that the file explorer and Internet Explorer are one and the same. The company line might not be true now, but it will be.

Is Microsoft going too far? Ask Sun Microsystems, which let Microsoft license its Java language and understandably was stunned when Microsoft released its own version of Java, supposedly superior because it took advantage of Windows specifically. Sun cried bloody murder (well, "breach of contract," to be specific) and the case is plodding its way through court.

Microsoft is unwilling to restrain its new, vicious, corporate piranha attitude, having evolved from a kid with a hepped-up calculator to a man with a legion of lawyers and more money than God. Gates wants you to remember that Microsoft grew from a small business, but so did Netscape, though Gates doesn't seem to mind sniffing out their jugular.

Microsoft is forcing the government to intervene.

Before the century is out, Microsoft will find itself on the receiving end of Janet Reno's Happy Paddle, rebuked with a nasty "don't do that!" and sent to bed without supper. And the world will wait for someone to write the program challenging Windows for its stranglehold on the world's PCs.

And at midnight, Jan. 1, 2000, all the world's computers blow up and we all die.

The end.

Klan reference unfair to most white males

Editor,

The author Mark Twain said, "I am personally acquainted with hundreds of journalists, and the opinion of the majority of them would not be worth two cents in private, but when they speak in print it is the 'newspaper' that is talking and then their utterance shake the community like the thunders of prophecy ..."

Although the date of that quote is 1873, here in 1998, I have found a perfect example of one columnist who has stood on a platform to snap down at readers who do not have the opportunity to retort to the backlash printed.

For this, I would like to take a moment to refute Pamela Manning's column in Wednesday's edition of the Collegian.

Manning, I am a white male and would like to take a moment to defend myself. First and foremost, I was born in the later part of the 20th century, so I will not be able to justify or defend the actions of human beings who lived some 200 years ago.

Second, it is more than offensive to assume the Ku Klux Klan can be used as a general reference to white Americans. Not only do I not condone the acts of that organization, but I too fear their destructive morals, and remember, I am white.

For you to assume such a vulgar thought is for me to assume all Christian people agree with the teachings of one Fred Phelps. Is that true? I surely hope not. And while I'm at it, I firmly believe you would get any job for which you qualified in any place in our country. If you have forgotten, we have a set of laws called civil rights upon which it is a crime to infringe.

If you do feel your civil rights have been violated, it is up to you to see that justice prevails.

We have enjoyed this protection under law for some 30 years. However, if you happen to be homosexual, then you can be discriminated against. Whether white or black, no legislation exists protecting these Americans, and yet their daily battles continue.

If injustice grieves you so, join them and fight the war that rages on. How many times have you been harassed by the Ku Klux Klan? Just last week, I personally was harassed at McCain Auditorium by a group, not in white hoods with burning crosses, but with little children proclaiming "God hates fags."

Manning, before you scold all Americans, remember that John Wilkes Booth, Lee Harvey Oswald and Tim McVeigh were and are American citizens, yet their crimes have hurt us all. Still, we will prevail to try and set a great example to all the world.

As you're American, please join me in learning from the past so as not to relive its less-than-flattering times, instead of bringing those deeds that don't affect us any more back into the light in which they don't belong.

If you wish to reflect on events 200 years ago, I invite you to do so, but instead of hate and fire, try to conjure up peaceful thoughts to improve all our lives.

Small-town mentality makes job hunt easier

Jealousy. Usually, I look upon it as a sickness, thinking the green-eyed monster wants to beat the hell out of me. This time it's different — I'm glad I'm jealous. I'm even marketing a new phrase for it. I'm calling it "pleasant jealousy." I'm jealous of everyone who grew up in a small town, someplace with a population anywhere from 100 to 49,999 people. Many of my classmates were raised in such places, and I think these people are the best among us. Granted, I'm not knocking big cities with mega-populations. As the daughter of a retired Air Force colonel and a multi-successful businesswoman, I've lived in or spent time in some of the best cities in the country, including New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, Atlanta and Phoenix. Not exactly places where everyone knows your name.

Small town folk are a big part of preserving some of our nation's most core values. It is these people of whom I am pleasantly jealous. If I had it to do all over again, I'd consider spending my life in a small town.

Never in a million years would I have found myself agreeing with former Vice President Dan Quayle. I prayed every day for George Bush's health and safety while he was president. But you know, Quayle wasn't all wrong when it came to his stance on family values. Sure, he made a mockery of single-motherhood by attacking the fictional TV character on "Murphy Brown." In a way, though, he had the best of intentions. My mother became a single parent after my father was caught with his hands in someone else's cookie jar. She's the best mom anyone could want. But if we'd lived in a small town, I wonder if my father would have succumbed to such temptations, which led to the demise of our relationship. I don't think so.

People I've come to know who are from small towns seem oblivious to this type of urban plight. The separation and divorce rates among their parents is practically non-existent. Most of their parents still are together and probably will be together when their children have children of their own. By that I am truly amazed. I acknowledge there are families in bigger cities that are put together just as well as those in smaller cities. In my experiences, though, I've found the instances to be rare.

My cohorts and I are doing that end-of-college job hunt. Rather than feeling a sense of urgency to run out and conquer the world, some of my closest friends just want to run out and conquer Kansas City. For myself, my first thought was "been there, done that." Then I stepped back and realized that for people who've not spent any lengthy amount of time there, it's OK for them. Why? Because it's close to their families or their romantic entanglements. What makes them happy is getting a decent job and being near the ones for whom they care. Again, I'm pleasantly jealous, because that's a great frame of mind.

Sure, I'm doing the same thing they are — trying to get a decent job — but I also am creating for myself a recipe for stress. What I'm thinking about is how I'm going to live up to my parent's success. How am I going to "make it?" Everything is about getting the next great job, then the one after that and so on. How can I make more money along the way? How long will it take until I truly have "arrived?" It's the American Dream gone awry. I think I picked up this sense of always having to be on the move because I've seen too much cutthroat, everybody-out-for-themselves thinking in the big cities. There's something to be said for the work ethic and good neighborliness that people who live in small towns are able to extend to others. Again, I stress that it does exist in some form or other in the urban metropolises; just not as much as it could.

This all came to mind as I began reflecting on my two years in Manhattan. No matter where I go, I really am going to miss this place. Obviously, this is the smallest city in which I have ever lived. If it weren't for a friend's strong recommendation, I wouldn't have found myself here. And I didn't even get out that much. It was just last month I overlooked the city for the first time from the water tower and I spent some time at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

No, unlike in the big cities, I actually will miss the grocery store. Yes, I'll miss Dillons. Not just because half the people I know work at one of them. In fact, when I have nothing better to do and no particular sense of direction, it's the most comfortable place to hang out and spend some money. You know what they say about food being a source of comfort. I'm sure I'll miss Aggieville. Everything in the big cities is so far away from where I need it to be. Living in Aggieville provided the opportunities for so much within a few blocks. What I won't miss, though, is the hullabaloo on Friday and Saturday nights.

I always will be pleasantly jealous of people who make Manhattan their permanent home. You can appreciate the atmosphere here when you've seen how stinky it can be in bigger vacuums. K-State and the Little Apple are the best well-kept secrets. The longer they remain that way, the less likely it is that they will crumble into an urban shell.

Tanning salons prepare customers for summer months

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

Hundreds of students already are turning golden brown — without the aid of the sun. As summer approaches, the indoor tanning season has begun.

Mike Houston, freshman in liberal arts, said he thinks a lot of people are tanning, because the tanning salon he uses has been so busy.

"I have to make an appointment about three or four days ahead of time," he said. "And, usually that's at about midnight."

Tisha Schlochtermeier, owner of Sun Connection, said her salon is incredibly busy this time of year.

"It's probably three times as busy as it is during the regular time of year," she said.

Most people tan to prepare for the summer months.

"I tan so I look good when I go out," Houston said. "I have a head start on everybody else."

"It's for physical appearance," Megan Miller, senior in mass communications, said. "I have such pale skin and freckles. It's just more for personal reasons."

Though there are many dangers associated with tanning, some reports also have shown that it may help alleviate depression and help with some skin conditions.

"The sun is actually very important to us," Schlochtermeier said. "We just recommend tanning in moderation."

Some common problems indoor tanners experience include uneven tans, rings around the eyes from goggles and lack of color under arms. Many tanners offer tips to prevent these problems.

"Moisturized skin always tans better," Schlochtermeier said. "Always use an accelerator."

If the back of the skin is darker than the front, she said she recommends flipping over.

"Most people just lay on their back," she said. "Some people like to roll over because you get a little darker on the back. The bulbs are right there."

Most tanners said they prefer to lie on their backs because it is more comfortable.

"That's the way I sleep," Renee Zacharias, senior in English, said. "I don't feel so claustrophobic."

"I don't like to lay on my stomach," Miller said. "I just feel like I am suffocating."

The circles around the eyes from the goggles can't be prevented safely.

"Wear the goggles," Schlochtermeier said. "Circles under eyes are minute compared to the damage that could be done."

"I make sure I wear my goggles," Houston said. "I've had times when my eyes get real blurry afterward if I don't."

Schlochtermeier said she thinks almost everyone knows the dangers of tanning. She said she advises people to stop before they burn.

"Avoid burning at all costs. That's what gives tanning the bad name," she said. "So many people want to get that red. They don't understand. You don't want to overdo it, just like anything."

Many tanners said they are not concerned with the health risks associated with tanning.

"I don't feel like I go enough to be concerned," Zacharias said. "I buy a card of 10 tans. Once those are done, I quit going."

Houston said he is not concerned about the effects of tanning, although he knows the risk of cancer.

Most tanning salons in Manhattan charge about $4.50 per tan or $30 for a package of 10 tanning sessions. The average session lasts 20 minutes and most tanners go one or two times per week.

Graves signs law for hog regulation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The massive piece of legislation that writes hog farming regulations into Kansas' statute books was signed into law on Monday.

Gov. Bill Graves signed the compromise bill — which had consumed House members' attention since January and was amended every step of the way — without a formal signing ceremony.

"The governor has said all along he thought the measure that was approved was a good middle ground," said his spokesman, Mike Matson.

"It was the product of a very thoughtful and careful process of the Legislature. They put a lot of work into it," Matson said.

In crafting the bill, lawmakers heard from family farmers, who said the bill would hamper their growth and leave them unable to support the families that relied on the farms.

Lawmakers also heard from environmentalists, who said the regulations were too weak and wouldn't be enough to prevent groundwater contamination. They also said it did nothing to control the stench from the huge operations.

For counties whose boards of commissioners decide to allow corporate hog farms in the future, the bill requires a county wide vote on the issue. Under current corporate-farming law, such votes are required only when enough residents sign petitions.

The core of the bill contains environmental regulations.

It contains specifics, such as required distances between pig farms and homes and wildlife refuges.

It also requires the state departments of Agriculture and Health and Environment create plans for things like odor control, dead animal disposal and waste disposal.

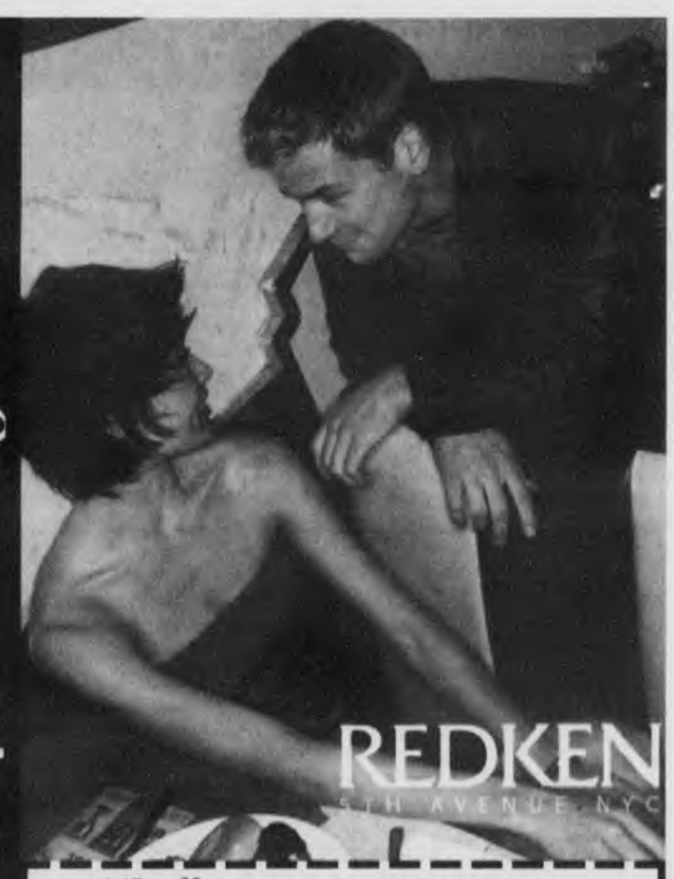
"A lot of people put a lot of work into it. Now the real work begins," said Rep. Laura McClure, D-Osborne, who helped write the bill and defended it on the House floor.

The budget bill, also signed Monday by Graves, contains $580,700 to double the number of full-time inspectors for confined feeding operations to 22, and to pay for the additional paperwork the new regulations will require.

"As heated as this has been, I'm sure a lot of the public and legislators will be watching," McClure said.

"I'm very pleased it is signed," McClure said. These are now part of statue. These have the force of law. What we had before were guidelines. There was wiggle room."

A lobbyist for Kansas environmental groups continued Monday to speak against big hog farms and suggested the bill would encourage them to come to Kansas.



Charles Benjamin, lobbyist for the Kansas Chapter of the Sierra Club and the Kansas Natural Resource Council, cited 21 counties voting against corporate hog farms and a recent city election in Great Bend in which four write-in candidates swept out incumbents on an anti-hog platform.

"It is too bad that the Kansas Legislature chose to ignore their pleas for help," Benjamin said in a news release.

The hog bill is HB 2950. Bills are available on the Kansas government Internet site at: ink.org/public/legislative/fulltext-bill

Several track athletes place high in weekend competition

The K-State track team, competing at three meets this weekend, recorded several quality performances.

The K-State men, ranked 21st in the nation by Trackwire, were led by Charles Burney. Burney won the Sooner Outdoor Invitational high jump with an NCAA provisional qualifying leap of 7-2.

Sprinter Randy Melbourne raced to the gold medal in the 400-meter dash with a time of 47.38 seconds.

The men's 1,600-meter relay team finished in 3:19.15 to win the event at the Sooner Outdoor.

At the Drake Relays, the K-State men's 3,200-meter relay team consisting of Istvan Nagy, Scott Galas, Matt Davis and Kevin Lewis captured the gold medal with a time of 7:24.88.

The Wildcat men won three throwing events on Saturday at the University of Missouri-Kansas City Invitational.

Gene Petersen spun the discus to a distance of 175-11 for the gold medal. Tamel Sisney captured the gold in the shot put with a throw of 53-3. David Graham won the javelin with a throw of 191-7.

The K-State women's team was highlighted by Renetta Seiler, who won the Drake Relays hammer with a throw of 202-4 1/4, an NCAA automatic qualifying mark. She also finished in second place in the discus with a mark of 162-5.

Freshmen Annie Wetterhus and Amanda Crouse both recorded personal records in their respective events at the Drake Relays. Wetterhus placed fifth in the 3,000 meters with a time of 9:55.75. Crouse ran 2:11.98 in the 800-meter race to place seventh.

At the UMKC Invitational, Anna Whitham tossed an NCAA provisional qualifying mark of 175-6 in the hammer to place second.

The women's team brought home five gold medals from the Sooner Outdoor.

Darcy Morris won the 400-meter dash with a time of 55.49 seconds. Kimela West won two events, the Section 3 200-meter dash with a time of 25.26 seconds and the triple jump with a leap of 38-5. Erin Anderson captured the gold in the high jump after negotiating 5-6. Rachel Woods won the Section 1 200-meter dash in 25.54 seconds.

Jamison declares for draft, will finish senior year early

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — Antawn Jamison is convinced he's ready for pro basketball, and he'll be going to the NBA with degree in hand.

The national player of the year said Monday he'll forgo his senior year at North Carolina, passing up a chance to become the Atlantic Coast Conference's career scoring leader to enter the NBA draft on June 24.

"When it was time to leave it was difficult to swallow because these three years have probably been the best three years of my life," Jamison said. "It is a lot more difficult than I thought it would be."

The 6-foot-9 forward was joined at a news conference by Coach Bill Guthridge, former coach Dean Smith, parents Albert and Kathy Jamison and several teammates.

"A big reason you are in coaching is you want what's best for your players," Guthridge said. "There aren't many that get this opportunity. So you are thrilled for him."

Jamison is the 13th player to declare early for the NBA draft, joining such players as Mike Bibby of Arizona, Paul Pierce of Kansas and Robert Traylor of Michigan. Among the 13 are two high school players.

Smith will advise underclassmen to turn pro if they're projected in the draft's top five. The former coach did most of the legwork for Jamison, calling at least 16 NBA teams to gauge interest. He likes what he heard.

Jamison, the school's first national player of the year since Michael Jordan in 1984, said he would get his college degree in African studies after two sessions of summer school, meaning he will graduate two semesters ahead of his class.

"The most important thing for me is no matter what happens I have the opportunity to graduate this summer," he said.

"That was the most important thing about coming to school, to get a degree and maybe having a chance to play in the NBA. I am so close to getting them both at the same time it was an opportunity I couldn't pass up."

Varsity four helps women's crew team win weekend regatta

K-State set the pace to qualify for the NCAA Championships after taking first place in the varsity four at the Midwestern Sprint Championships.

The Wildcats qualified for finals Saturday in Madison, Wis., after taking the top time in preliminaries. The Cats also captured the victory in the finals against five other boats to take the gold medal.

K-State coach Jenny Hale said this was a large regatta, and the team prioritized the varsity four.

"We are trying to get an at-large bid and have a high team finish for the NCAA Championships," Hale said.

Hale said the Cats changed the lineup by switching Suzie Sher to stroke and Rebecca Riemer to the two seat.

"Sometimes you just find a little more rhythm with one athlete over another," she said. "This gave us a little extra help with blade work."

Tricia Troyer, bough seat in the varsity four, said, "When we knew we were in the finals, it enhanced our goals. We knew we were there."

Sara Swan, third seat in the varsity four, said, "No one in the boat realized we were the top time in the finals until we were put in lane three, the fast lane."

Swan said the conditions were unfavorable, but the team was used to that.

"We row in windy weather every day, so we were prepared and it gave us quite an advantage."

Swan said the boat had a great start, breaking open water in the first 500 meters.

"This is something we haven't done," she said. "The race was really tight, and when we realized we were winning, we weren't going to let go."

"We were hoping to be in the top three," she said. "We got our catches in and our blades stayed in the water longer than the other teams. That's how we won."

Troyer said, "We were all excited because this is the first time Kansas State has won such a prestigious competition."

Along with the varsity four, the second varsity eight also made it into the grand finale. The Cats took fifth place out of eight.

K-State's first novice eight drew a tough heat in preliminaries and missed qualifying for the grand finale by less than a second. Competing in the petite finals, the Cats took first place with a time of 7:01.25, which would have given them silver medals in the grand finale. The boat finished seventh of 12 places. The University of Iowa posted the winning time of 6:59.18 in the grand finale.

K-State's first varsity eight finished its day in the petite finals in seventh place out of 14. The second novice eight did not qualify for finals.

Hale said, "I think we exceeded our expectations as to what our team as a whole can do."

Swan said this was a great finish for K-State to have all the boats finish as well as they did.

"The regatta was a huge stepping stone for the whole team. I think we are carrying a lot more confidence into next week's competition," she said.

The Cats' next regatta will be Saturday and Sunday at Ann Arbor, Mich. The regatta will be host to Big 10 schools Michigan, Michigan State and Ohio State as well as K-State. All three Big 10 universities competed with the Cats in the Midwest Rowing Championships.

Cats improve in tennis, lose tournament to Hawks

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

Round two against Kansas yielded a much better performance, but the same end result for the K-State tennis team at the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

The Wildcats improved greatly on the 8-1 dismantling from the Jayhawks less than a month earlier in Manhattan.

In that meet, the Cats' only win came at No. 5 singles, where Dinah Watson prevented the sweep. This time around, the Cats looked to the top of the lineup for victories.

Despite the previous loss, Coach Steve Bietau said he was not surprised by his team's strong showing.

"This performance was within the range of what we expected," he said.

Yana Dorodnova, ranked No. 46 in the nation, provided K-State with the early lead as she continued her strong season. She beat Kylie Hunt 6-1, 5-7, 4-1 (retired). Hunt was forced to retire immediately after spraining her ankle when down 4-1 in the third set.

This is Dorodnova's second win of the season over a top-15 player. Earlier in the season, she beat Holly Parkinson of BYU, who is No. 5.

The Cats also had strong performances at No. 2 and No. 3 singles. Both Martina Pospisilova at No. 2 and Anna Pampoulova at No. 3 lost in tough three-set matches.

At No. 4, Eva Novotna' outlasted No. 75 Kris Sell 6-4, 2-6, 7-6 (8-6). Bietau said this was a good finish for Novotna', who had experienced difficulty closing out close matches all season.

"She was in a real tight situation with Sell and at the end of the match, when it counted the most, she played the best she has played," Bietau said.

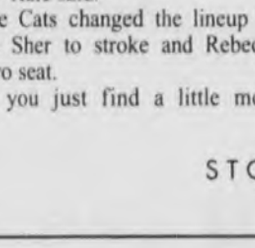
Bietau also made some adjustments in his doubles lineup, which had struggled to close out matches after the team had built leads in the singles. The moves seemed to pay off.

"We were looking for anything we could do to strengthen one more position," Bietau said.

He moved Pospisilova up to the No. 1 spot to join Dorodnova. The pair kept the Cats alive as they beat KU's tandem of Brooke Chiller and Christie Sim 8-5.

"I was really comfortable and confident playing with (Pospisilova)," Dorodnova said. "I communicated well with her, and she always kept a positive attitude."

However, it wasn't enough as the Jayhawks won at No. 2 doubles, clinching the victory and eliminating the Cats.



No. 3 doubles wasn't completed after the Jayhawks picked up their fifth point.

The Cats must now wait until May 4 to find out if they are selected for the NCAA Tournament. Bietau said he considers this team to be one that could make the tournament, although it hasn't clinched a berth yet.

"We're in a position where we have a chance to get in," Bietau said. "But we haven't put ourselves in a spot where we are definitely in."

What in heaven's name has gone on inside Reggie White's head? God only knows

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

Scott is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

God spoke to Reggie White last week. The greatest defensive end in NFL history was nursing his 36-year-old back during an April 21 therapy session, two days after he told Green Bay coach Mike Holmgren he wouldn't return for the second year of a five-year contract extension. Suddenly, all outside noise fell silent to internal peace.

"God spoke to me and said, 'You made a promise,'" White told reporters at Wednesday's press conference. "'You promised you would play two years, and I want you to fulfill your commitment.'"

God has talked to White before. When he was a free agent six years ago, God told him to sign with the Green Bay Packers. God told him his hyperextended elbow was healed in 1994 and in 1995 told him his torn hamstring was OK to play.

God only knows to whom White listened March 25.

White, an associate pastor at the Inner City Church in Knoxville, Tenn., was invited by Wisconsin Assembly Speaker Scott Hensen to talk about urban renewal, White's recent trip to Israel, and the New Hope project to promote minority business.

Now, White cites the Bible often. Knows every verse and could recite The Book quicker than his own autobiography, "In the Trenches." He earned the nickname "Minister of Defense" while a consensus all-American at the University of Tennessee. The 12-time Pro Bowl selection preaches to his teammates before games and led the Denver Broncos and Packers in prayer at midfield after Super Bowl XXXII.

Never could you have fathomed the puzzled, embarrassed, open-mouthed, insulted looks on Rep. Tim Carpenter and Rep. Rosemary Potter's faces when White unloaded an hourlong speech before a mostly white collaboration of Wisconsin lawmakers March 25.

The harmonious sermon transformed into independent lectures based on sin and racial stereotyping. White said rampant homosexuality — "one of the biggest sins" — was responsible for the condition America is in today.

He said blacks were "gifted at worship and celebration," said whites were "good at organization," said Asians could "turn a television into a watch," and said Hispanics knew how to "put 20 to 30 people in one home."

The raving ovation White received before approaching lawmakers fell to dismal silence. Each emphasized word provoked a curling of the toes, a tightening of the fists, and sent shockwaves throughout a nation that continues to fight negative racial issues in society and sports.

Aside from the homosexuality issue, White's intent was to praise. Instead, he insulted.

"I know the type of person I am, I know I care about people," White told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel. "But I'm not going to back off what I know God has put in my heart to share."

White returned home, seemingly unaware of the damage he had done. Usually when the NFL careersack leader tackles a quarterback, he takes a moment and looks back to inspect the damage — he doesn't want anyone to suffer a career-ending injury due to his aggressive prowess.

'Mercury Rising' appears transparent

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

Bruce Willis and Alec Baldwin team up in what could be the beginning of the end of two decent careers.

"Mercury Rising" is a cross between "Die Hard" and "Rainman."

Someone please remind the directors of this world that combining two good things is how we end up with tuna fish ice cream, "Princess Diana: The Broadway Musical" and the Spice Girls.

When Simon Lynch, a 9-year-old autistic boy, breaks a government "super code" that just happened to find its way into a children's word-puzzle book, his parents are killed and he ends up on the government's "ultra-secret" most-wanted list.

The child escapes a professional hit man by hiding in the closet, where FBI agent Art Jeffries (Bruce Willis) stumbles across him. Jeffries assigns himself to be the boy's protectorate and surrogate father and hides Simon from wine connoisseur and international bad guy Nicholas Kudrow (Baldwin).

Jeffries' hiding techniques leave something to be desired, though, as he leaves Simon with a woman he picks up in a coffee shop and hides himself in a bar and grill with automatic doors where everyone is able to find him.

"Mercury Rising" could be a great action movie with government bad guys, subway chases and an amusing anti-hero face off in a wine cellar, however, you can just hear the production meetings where Willis, who still insists on considering himself a serious actor, demanded the additions of father-figure motifs and lines that sound like something written for Tom Hanks.

I never thought I would say this, but this would have been a good movie minus the attempt at character development.

The only thing making this movie is Simon, played by Miko Hughes of "Cops and Robbersons" and "Spawn." His portrayal is a little too real at times. Rainman holds nothing on this kid. Sadly, it's not enough. Industrial Light & Magic's special effects are below par for a big-budget film, and the believability aspect is nearly nonexistent.

"Mercury Rising" appears to be just another attempt to make blockbuster action movies appeal to a female audience.

I would like to apologize on behalf of the producers and directors for thinking so poorly of women.

Adam, Dr. Drew to dole out advice in McCain

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

"Loveline", MTV's popular advice show, will be making an appearance in McCain Auditorium in the fall, courtesy of the Union Program Council.

"Loveline" also can be found from midnight until 2 a.m. on KMKF-FM 101.5 as a call-in advice show.

"We've been interested in this since October of last year. We knew they were coming on the circuit, and we're already looking forward to it," said Becky Wilson, UPC Issues and Ideas Committee chairwoman.

The event will be Oct. 2. Tickets will be $7 for students and $12 for non-students.

"We'll probably start selling tickets in September," Wilson said. "We have hopes of selling out within a couple of weeks of letting them out. McCain only has around 1,800 seats."

The hosts of "Loveline" are Dr. Drew Pinsky, a board-certified physician and addiction medical specialist, and Adam Carolla, the common-person comedian of the duo, Wilson said.

"They answer questions on relationships, sex and drugs," she said.

People will be able to attend the event and have their own questions answered that evening.

"We'll have people out there to come around so people can have their questions answered. As far as I know they've never been stumped before, so they'll have an answer no matter what the question," Teto Henderson, UPC program adviser, said.

There was some talk of televising the show in McCain, but that will not happen.

"It will be a completely self-contained event," Henderson said.

There is already a great deal of excitement about the event, although it is still months away.

"There's already a lot of enthusiasm. We've already had people volunteering to help," Wilson said.

Semisonic blitzes listeners with schizophrenic sounds

MARY RENEE SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Semisonic's single "Closing Time" has hit airways across the nation, and the video for the tune has been on MTV for a while now. The lyrics aren't all that deep, nothing that will change the world. The tunes aren't anything to write home about, but it's all upbeat enough to let you know the fun music of summer is on its way.

Semisonic should stick to the up-tempo songs. The ballads on the band's compact disc "Feeling Strangely Fine" leave much to be desired. They just aren't interesting enough to make you want to hang around for the chorus. If you do make it to the chorus, you'll be sorely disappointed.

This band seems to be schizophrenic. Half of the songs on the release could compete with Spice Girls for cheesy teen-age music, but the other half give glimpses of a much better band to come.

Music Review

"Never You Mind" is a peppy tune, peppered with "Star Trek" references sprinkled throughout, and it surely will be a chart topper in the next few months.

The band walks on the risque side with "Completely Pleased." Lyrics such as "I want to see you smiling, weak in the knees. I want to see you come, come, completely pleased," unfortunately will get the song bumped from the playlists of Midwestern radio stations. "Completely Pleased" is actually one of the better tracks on the CD, taking a risk and not buying into the pop Top 40 sound completely.

"Singing in My Sleep" makes me nauseous. I just couldn't get past the repetitive synthesizer/piano riff. The song just reminded me of everything I hated about the '80s. I wouldn't even have roller-skated to this tune.

For a first big release the album is bearable, but I wouldn't buy it unless it's on sale. The video ain't bad neither.

U.S.-Iraq embargo to continue despite progress

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The United States acknowledged Monday that Iraq had made progress in dismantling its nuclear weapons program but said it was too early to lift economic sanctions or scale back arms inspections.

"There appears to be some progress in the nuclear file," U.S. Ambassador Bill Richardson said. "However, we believe that it is premature to totally close that file without further steps" or to end the sanctions.

Richardson's remarks were made during a Security Council review of the U.N. weapons-inspection program in Iraq and economic sanctions against Baghdad, imposed in 1990 after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait touched off the Persian Gulf War.

Council members were expected to continue the trade restrictions, although China's envoy said they should be lifted as soon as possible. But British Ambassador John Weston said none of the 15 council ambassadors had proposed ending the sanctions now.

The council adjourned an afternoon session to hear a personal appeal from Iraq's foreign minister, Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf, to lift the embargo.

During the closed-door session, the United States came under strong pressure from Russia, France, China and others to have the council issue a formal acknowledgment of Iraq's progress in nuclear disarmament.

Russia circulated a draft resolution that would indicate Iraq has cooperated fully with U.N. inspectors on nuclear issues but still would be subject to inspections if the International Atomic Energy Agency receives more information about its clandestine program.

After U.S.-led forces drove the Iraqis from Kuwait, the council agreed to maintain the sanctions until U.N. inspectors certified that Iraq had destroyed all long-range missiles and chemical, nuclear and biological weapons.

The review is the first since Iraq signed a deal last February with Secretary-General Kofi Annan to open all sites, including presidential compounds, to U.N. arms inspectors. That reduced for the moment the threat of a U.S.-led military strike.

In his latest six-month report, the chief U.N. inspector, Richard Butler, said the standoff over presidential sites made it virtually impossible to determine if Iraq had complied with disarmament orders.

But the IAEA, in a separate report, said it had found no evidence that Iraq still was building nuclear weapons secretly. Based on that finding, several countries want the council to acknowledge Iraq's cooperation and scale down nuclear inspections.

Although Iraq never was believed to actually have produced nuclear weapons, Baghdad maintained an advanced nuclear-research program that experts said they believe was on the verge of building a bomb before the Gulf War.

Based on the IAEA report, China's deputy U.N. ambassador, Shen Guofang, said weapons inspections should be closed as soon as possible.

France's U.N. ambassador, Alain Dejammet, said it was too early to lift sanctions but argued the council should take stock of Iraq's progress in nuclear weapons.

But U.S. officials said they are concerned that effectively closing the book on Iraq's nuclear file might step up international pressure to end the sanctions prematurely.

Nevertheless, Washington, D.C., also fears an uncompromising stand will backfire and weaken international resolve to maintain the overall inspections and the sanctions program.

"There's one narrow area involving the nuclear weapons programs that have been reviewed carefully by the International Atomic Energy Agency," White House spokesman Mike McCurry said. "And we're recommending that the IAEA continue to work carefully to determine whether there's been full compliance."

Iraq has accused the United States and Britain of manipulating the inspection program to maintain sanctions indefinitely.

'CyberCop' begins in St. Marys

▶ COMMUNITY CAN ALERT AUTHORITIES ANONYMOUSLY USING WORLD WIDE WEB.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. MARYS, Kan. — When Police Chief Herb Bishop decided to reach out on the Internet to residents in this rural community, he had no idea how far he could go.

Bishop and Reserve Officer Del Latham wanted to use the Net to fight crime, although the police in this quiet town of 1,800 spend most of their time dealing with vehicle accidents, vandalism and stray dogs.

What the two men created was CyberCop, a World Wide Web site fully functional since the first of the year. Bishop said he believes it's unique among police agencies in Kansas. The site is at saintmarys.com/cybercop_main.

"We decided to use the Internet as a Crimestoppers," Bishop said.

The president of the Kansas Association of Chiefs of Police, Iola Police Chief Rex Taylor, said he was unaware of any other police agency in the state with a similar site.

"It has a lot of the same information we would ask for Crimestoppers," Taylor said. "It looks real interesting and another way for us to get information. It's the wave of the future."

The only drawback, Bishop said, is that while CyberCop has had nearly 300 visitors, nobody so far has used it to report any wrongdoing in this close-knit community.

Bishop said he isn't disheartened by that. For one thing, CyberCop has been operational fully for only four months, and there has been little publicity or advertisement about it.

One advantage of CyberCop is that it offers virtual anonymity, because it has been designed so e-mail messages Bishop receives leave no return computer address.

"This is a small town, and a lot of people don't want to call on the phone because they think we will know who it is," Bishop said during an interview at his City Hall office.

When the form is filled out, it's sent as an e-mail to Bishop's computer, and he is the only one who reads it. He said he makes a copy for the police files and deletes the information from the computer.

"It's no different than an anonymous tip; we're just bringing it into the cyber age," Latham said. "We're not trying to pry into anybody's private life."

White's words lose credibility for him

This time, White never really looked back.

Sure, some of the words might have been misinterpreted, White reasoned, "but that's not going to deter me or change the way I think."

White's answering machine was stacked with positive messages from friends, fans and university professors. What White didn't hear was the unbearable hush, the hush he's heard during his 13-year career when Packer fans witness a loss of hope in the closing seconds.

In a matter of hours, everyone fell silent as countless questions consumed millions of American citizens.

White, recipient of the 1992 Byron "Whizzer" White Humanitarian Award, the 1996 Simon Wiesenthal Center's tolerance award and the 1996 Jackie Robinson Humanitarian Award (what would Jackie think?), found himself sidelined by character attacks from civil rights groups, the Human Rights Campaign, and the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said White isn't a spokesman for black people. The American Civil Liberties Union of Wisconsin agreed White's comments wouldn't improve race relations.

Jimmy Sexton, White's agent, didn't speak. The NFL didn't speak. Green Bay Packers' front office wouldn't speak. Campbell, Nike, and even Peterson Ford in Oconto Falls, Wis., scratched their heads.

No comment.

"I think our nation wants people that will be politically correct," White told The Washington Post days later. "I am not politically correct. I base my lifestyle on what God is telling me to do. What did Jesus do in similar situations: He said things people didn't like. In a way, I'm no different. There were lies spread on him and lies spread on me."

White may compare himself to Jesus, but sports fans compare White's words to racial stereotyping — unfair words that led to the resignation of Al Campanis, former Los Angeles Dodgers' vice president. It cost Jimmy "the Greek" Snyder a sportscasting job in 1998 and ruined Fuzzy Zoeller's sportscasting hopes last year. White, too, was in contention for a CBS sportscasting job until March 25.

Wednesday, White sat in the press conference and was supposed to announce he would never play football again.

With Coach Holmgren by his side, White instead told the nation God spoke to him.

White will continue to preach. America will continue to listen. White will play another season. America will watch.

But when will God talk to Reggie again? And what will he say? And will Reggie listen?

Who was Reggie White listening to March 25?

God only knows.

strategy session on May 19, quickly undermined a key premise behind Wall Street's rally.

With the first three months of 1998 shaping up as the worst quarter for corporate profit growth since the nation was emerging from a recession in late 1991, many investors had been betting on an economic spurt later in the year — they hoped with the stimulative effect of a Fed rate cut.

But with Asian markets showing signs of stability, the Fed apparently wanted to signal it is refocusing on inflationary pressures at home, analysts said.

"I've never seen that before. We weren't supposed to see that report until May 21," said John Lynch, director of investment strategy at Interstate/Johnson Lane in Charlotte, N.C. "Somehow, somebody got their hands on it."

The prospect of higher Fed rates rattled the bond market, where the yield on the 30-year Treasury — a key influence on borrowing costs for both companies and consumers — jumped above 6 percent for the first time since early March.

The sudden turn for the worse in the interest rate outlook gave stock investors an excuse to secure some gains from the market's advance.

Analysts were quick to note, however, that overall backdrop remained encouraging.

"Nothing fundamental has changed. You still have sustainable levels of economic growth, virtually no inflation, excess money (to be invested), and rising corporate profits. That's a recipe for higher stock prices, not lower," Hill said. "Psychology drives things on a single-day basis, but fundamentals usually reassert themselves, as they have repeatedly throughout this bull market."

The day's losses were extremely broad-based. Declining issues outnumbered advancers by nearly a 9-to-1 margin on the New York Stock Exchange, where volume totaled a hefty 693.20 million shares, well more than Friday's pace.

J.P. Morgan slid 3 7/8 to 131 3/4, and Merck fell 11/16 to 112 13/16 as the Dow's biggest decliners. Only four of the Dow's 30 components posted a gain for the day.

The Nasdaq composite index fell 48.65 to 1,820.31, its third-steepest point drop ever. Among the leading Nasdaq technology names, Intel fell 2 1/16 to 80, Dell Computer fell 2 to 74 5/16, and Microsoft fell 1 13/16 to 90 5/16.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 21.36 to 1,086.54, the NYSE composite index fell 11.42 to 563.05, and the American Stock Exchange composite index fell 12.86 to 729.00.

Overseas, Tokyo's Nikkei stock average fell 2.3 percent, the Frankfurt's DAX index fell 1.1 percent and London's FT-SE 100 fell 2.4 percent.

Upgrades sometimes needed for accuracy, professors say

Richard Ott, associate professor of accounting, said he agreed with statistics that the prices of books have increased considerably since he was an undergraduate at K-State in the 1960s.

For Ott's tax classes, he requires students to buy a new textbook every year. Depending on how drastically the law has changed every year, sometimes Ott allows his students in graduate courses to keep the same books.

When choosing a textbook, Ott looks for technical accuracy in tax and also for a book that is written in a way students can read and understand.

"If I like a book, I really don't look at cost too much," Ott said. "There is no drastic difference in price. But to me, having a good textbook is critical."

Buying a new textbook is fundamental when the information in the text continuously upgrades with technology. Stuart Swartz, department head and professor of civil engineering, said a concrete-design book for civil engineering usually costs $70 to $80.

"I use basically the same authors every time. Some other people in the department change books fairly regularly," Swartz said.

He said prices have gone up throughout the years.

"It's just the way you do business in higher education," he said.

Doctors may abort pregnancy late in term if life endangered

The procedure involves partially extracting a fetus, legs first; cutting an incision in the barely visible skull base; then draining the contents of the skull so it will fit through the birth canal.

Under the new law, a late-term abortion is allowed when two physicians determine it is needed to save the woman's life or that continuing the pregnancy will cause "a substantial and irreversible impairment of a major bodily function of the pregnant woman."

It also requires physicians performing abortions after the 22nd week of pregnancy to file a report with the state health department spelling out the reasons it was necessary.

Graves' fellow Republicans in the Legislature praised his action.

"I'm very pleased, because he's in step with a huge majority of the populace. I'm very thankful for his careful deliberation," said Sen. Karin Brownlee, R-Olathe, who is strongly against abortion.

Brownlee and a lobbyist for the pro-life group Kansans for Life said they were pleasantly surprised by Graves' decision.

Senate Majority Leader Tim Emert, R-Independence, praised Graves for taking courageous action in signing the bill.

The governor also drew praise from Sen. Sandy Praeger, R-Lawrence, who voted against the bill.

"I think it is a courageous decision by the governor. I am actually very proud of him," Praeger said. "If we are going to put this issue behind us, both sides are going to have to compromise."

Graves said he spent hundreds of hours carefully analyzing the measure, doing homework that wasn't done in the legislative process on the measure.

He also said his research convinced him of the unconstitutionality of the present Kansas law because it doesn't provide a health exception for the pregnant woman.

The new law seeks in a limited way to address the unconstitutional aspect of the current law, Graves said.

VOL. 102 NO. 144 WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1998 COLLEGIAN.KSU.EDU

Architects named for expansion

▸ EXPANSION PROJECT SET FOR COMPLETION BY 1999 CAMPAIGN.

COLLEGIAN STAFF

The expansion project to add an estimated 7,000 seats to KSU Stadium now has a partnership of two architectural firms.

HOK Sports Facilities Group, of Kansas City, Mo., will operate in a joint venture with Brent Bowman & Associates, of Manhattan, to renovate and expand K-State's football stadium. The project is scheduled to be completed before the 1999 season and cost $12.8 million.

The Kansas Board of Regents approved the sale of bonds in January for the project.

Director of Intercollegiate Athletics Max Urick pledged that student ticket sales would not decrease as a result of last fall's failed student body vote for an expansion privilege fee.

HOK Sports is a division of Hellmuth, Obata & Kassabaum Inc., one of the four architecture firms that specialize in sports architecture, and recognized by World Architecture as the No. 1 design firm in the sports category, Kent Brown, director of K-State's Sports Information, said.

Brent Bowman, a 1972 K-State architecture graduate, was the architect for the renovation of Manhattan Public Library, Manhattan Regional Airport, Frank Anneberg Park and Wildcat Creek Sports Center, St. Thomas More Catholic Church and Hale Library, for which his firm won an Award for Excellence in Architecture from the American Institute of Architects of Kansas. He also is working on the Manhattan City Hall improvement project.

Kansas law requires state agencies to hire an architect from Kansas to lead construction projects or at least a Kansas architect in association with another firm, Cheryl Strecker, assistant university attorney, said.

Bowman was out of town and could not be reached for comment.

Player arrested on drug charges

▸ VASILJEVIC RELEASED ON $900 BOND, AWAITS ARRAIGNMENT ON FRIDAY.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

K-State basketball player Pero Vasiljevic was arrested early Tuesday morning after police officers investigating an alleged break-in at his apartment discovered a pipe with marijuana inside.

Vasiljevic, 20, a freshman from Australia, was arrested on suspicion of possession of marijuana, drug paraphernalia and obstruction of the legal process.

He was released on $900 bond while Riley County prosecutors review the case and decide whether to file charges agains Vasiljevic.

The events started when Vasiljevic called police at about 2:45 a.m. Tuesday saying someone was trying to break in to his apartment, Riley County Police Capt. Allen Raynor said. Police who responded said the area was quiet when they arrived.

"He appeared to be a little disoriented to us and a little irrational," Raynor said.

About an hour after the officers left, Vasiljevic and a female friend called police again, saying someone was inside the apartment holding the door shut, and they wanted police to search the home, Raynor said.

VASILJEVIC

When the officers began walking through the rooms, they found the pipe. A test showed the residue inside was marijuana, Raynor said. Raynor told The Associated Press that Vasiljevic "did claim ownership of it."

Vasiljevic is scheduled to be arraigned in Riley County District Court on Friday.

City approves landscaping for business

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan City Commissioners moved one step closer to welcoming Sykes Enterprises Inc. as the anchor tenant of the 189-acre business park Tuesday, but not without objection.

Commissioners unanimously approved a $253,032.50 contract with Manhattan Trenching Inc. to grade the site of the new business and pave an access road, named Sykes Drive, into the park.

Sykes is expected to open its Manhattan center by August, when it will handle an estimated 12,000 telephone calls per day from frustrated computer users looking for technical support. The company chose Manhattan after receiving a $6.73 million incentive package — $3.6 million of which comes from the city.

Tuesday's special meeting was part of the fast-paced plan to open the Sykes facility as soon as possible. Public Works Director Jerry Petty said the company expects to receive bids for its building Friday, and it could apply for a building permit as early as May 7.

The city's responsibilities, including sanitary sewer service, street paving, water service and utilities, are also on the fasttrack, Petty said. Rushing to meet Sykes' demands will help develop a utility system for the entire business park, which is next to Manhattan Regional Airport.

But Sykes, which is expected to boost the area economy by at least $12 million, isn't getting unanimous approval from Linda Stadel, whose house sits just 75 feet north of the proposed building site.

Stadel spoke to commissioners about her concerns, which are based on the proximity of her home to the Sykes building. Stadel said air conditioning units, dumpsters and noise from delivery trucks will drive down the value of her property and the quality of country life.

"We feel that having this large commercial building very close to our home greatly reduces the value of our home and drastically changes our lifestyle of country living," she said.

Petty said the building could have been farther from the Stadel residence had Sykes put its employee parking lot behind the new building as city officials suggested. But Sykes opposed a parking lot at the back of its facility because the building only features one entrance in the front for security purposes.

"We talked long and hard about building locations, some of which have included parking in the back. They are adamantly opposed to that," Petty said.

"They only have the one door on the front, so employees would have to walk all the way around the building."

Commissioners also approved a contract with BG Consultants and Schwab-Eaton, two Manhattan consulting firms, to study the development of water and storm-drainage systems in the business park.

Petty said those systems will be developed at a slower pace than utilities and streets, which are essential to Sykes' planned August opening.

Sykes will use water from Riley County Rural Water District 1 until a link to the city's water main can be completed.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said the two consulting firms were natural choices for the job, because both already have dealt with other aspects of the park development.

"I think it's appropriate that we proceed with these firms because of their expertise with the business park and also because of the time frame," Snead said.

Congress passes legislation restricting U.N. payments

▸ SENATE, HOUSE AGREE NOT TO PAY U.N. DUES WITHOUT ABORTION LAWS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate, following the House's lead, approved legislation Tuesday imposing abortion restrictions on the payment of $926 million in back dues to the United Nations. The White House quickly announced President Clinton would veto the bill, even though the U.N. payments are a top priority.

The vote was narrow, 51 to 49.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., warned that a veto would be a big mistake, and said he doubted Clinton would get another chance this year to get the U.N. money through the Republican-led Congress.

"In my opinion, this is it," Lott said.

But White House deputy press secretary Barry Toiv said, "By including this extraneous but controversial provision relating to family planning, the Congress leaves the president no choice but to veto the bill.

"We hope they will get the bill up here quickly so the president can veto it and we can move on to separating this issue from this essential legislation, as it ought to be separated," Toiv said.

The legislation also would authorize an array of State Department programs and reorganize the foreign-policy bureaucracy.

The bill, which passed the House last month, next goes to Clinton. The thin margin of approval — where Democrats opposing passage were joined by Republicans who support abortion rights — suggested a veto would be sustained.

In remarks in the Rose Garden, Clinton condemned Congress' failure to provide payment of the back U.N. dues without strings attached or to approve his request for $18 billion to help the International Monetary Fund ease the strains of the Asian financial crisis.

"We think that different rules apply to us, and we have a right not to pay our way so we can have this fight over an issue that is unrelated to our U.N. responsibilities or our IMF responsibilities," the president said. "I don't think that is a responsible, mature message to send to the world

Scholar to lecture on ethnic issues affecting citizens in next millenium

▸ SPEAKER'S DIVERSE STUDIES TO VISIT KSU ON THURSDAY.

BRENNA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Michael Dyson is a scholar in race and ethnicity, an ordained minister and writer on the hip-hop culture, who will be at K-State to speak on the thinking and behavior between black and white people.

The title of Dyson's speech, "Race Rules: Navigating the Color Line," which he will give at 10:30 a.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium, is also the title of his latest book. He wrote the book because he wants to help navigate the issues of power, justice and equality that divide black and white people.

"He'll be looking at the future of race ethnicity in the 21st century," said Juanita McGowan, director of the American ethnic studies program, which is sponsoring the lecture. "If you're concerned about the future of race and ethnicity relations, we'll learn how to fit in the millennium with our own behavior."

With Dyson's diverse areas of expertise, he can reach all people, McGowan said, who also said Dyson has been known to rap during his speeches.

"He goes into all three bags and weaves it in. He's dynamic," McGowan said.

Currently a visiting distinguished professor of African-American studies at Columbia University, Dyson originally had been slated to speak during Martin Luther King Week and had to cancel the appearance two weeks before his speech. McGowan said it was a blessing he was willing and able to return.

She also said people will recognize Dyson from his interviews on a variety of TV networks that look for opinions in the areas of race relations and ethnicity.

DYSON

McGowan said that since the alleged hazing incident with Kappa Alpha Psi, Dyson plans on visiting with black greek organizations on campus at 9 a.m. in Union 207, offering advice on how to develop positive intragroup relationships.

From Dyson's speech, K-State's American ethnic studies program will be able to design a framework for a program for students to understand and apply the national race relations issues he discusses on a local level.

Dyson's speech will address how differently people will see racism in the 21st century compared with the 1950s, '60s and '70s.

"We must understand race within the context of which we live. What will be the race rules?" McGowan said.

Kansas teacher charged with 8 counts of indecent liberties with teen student

GARDEN CITY, Kan. — A Garden City teacher was charged Monday with eight counts of indecent liberties with a child.

Robin Melissa Sharp, 27, had taught hearing impaired students for four years. She was arrested Friday for allegedly having sex with a 14-year-old student.

The charges are felonies punishable by 46 to 51 months in prison for each count.

The name of the 14-year-old student has not been released.

Aggravated indecent liberties with a child in Kansas includes sexual intercourse with a child who is 14 or 15 years old and engaging in lewd fondling or touching with a non-consenting child age 14 or 15.

Sharp's bond amount will remain at $15,000. Her second court appearance is scheduled for May 7.

The school district suspended Sharp with pay, and she resigned effective the end of the school year.

State Supreme Court agrees to hear case about Wyandotte County auto race track

TOPEKA — The state Supreme Court will settle legal issues surrounding a proposed auto race track in Wyandotte County and render a decision more quickly than normal.

The court agreed Tuesday to accept a petition from Wyandotte County District Attorney Nick Tomasic. It set arguments in the case for 1:30 p.m. May 28.

Tomasic filed his petition last week. Normally, arguments before the court occur about six months after a case is filed, to give the attorneys time to prepare legal briefs.

Tomasic filed his petition over a new state law that allows the unified government of the county and Kansas City, Kan., to issue bonds to help finance the project. The bonds are to be paid off over 30 years with property tax and sales tax revenues generated by the speedway.

Before the change, the bonds would have had to be retired in 20 years. Wyandotte County officials argued the county could not have afforded to strike a deal with the International Speedway Corp. without the change.

The district attorney has said he is not opposed to the track but wants to settle legal issues, so litigation does not delay the project.

Eleven homeowners who would be displaced by the track have sued the unified government. They are trying to keep the track from being built where they live.

Vice president thanks powerful unions for connecting poor schools to Internet

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a high-tech ceremony Tuesday that was as much policy as politics, Vice President Al Gore nudged forward the administration's effort to guarantee universal Internet access in America's schools and congratulated labor unions for their help.

Gore and Education Secretary Richard Riley invited officials from three of the nation's largest and most politically powerful labor unions — the AFL-CIO, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Communications Workers of America — to the White House for the announcement of new Internet initiatives:

—The Education Department is donating 2,000 surplus computers to schools in poor communities.

—Special "education rate" discounts of between 20 percent and 90 percent off Internet access will allow every school in the 50 largest urban school districts to connect to the Net by April 1999.

—The Bureau of Indian Affairs will get special help connecting its 185 schools — and 53,000 young students — to the Internet by next spring.

—The National Science Foundation and the Education Department have developed online tutoring and mentoring services for students.

—The Commerce Department will conduct a three-month analysis of trends in Internet usage to determine whether there is a racial divide between informational haves and have-nots.

"We can let technology be a negative force that furthers divisions, or we can use it to connect all Americans together and give them the same shot at success," Gore said.

New trial requested by McVeigh lawyers for juror misconduct, alleged confession

DENVER — Timothy McVeigh's lawyers told a federal appeals court Tuesday he deserves a new trial in the Oklahoma City bombing because of juror misconduct and the publication of a purported confession from him just before the case began.

The lawyers also argued in front of a three-judge panel of the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the judge at the trial, Richard Matsch, unfairly restricted questioning of prospective jurors about the death penalty.

Prosecutor Sean Connelly countered that the jury that convicted McVeigh and sentenced him to death for the April 1995 bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building was impartial and diligent. The bombing claimed 168 lives.

A ruling from the appeals is not expected before the summer.

The claim of juror misconduct stemmed from a comment one juror allegedly made to another during a recess, before the prosecution's case was completed and the defense had started. According to defense attorney Robert Nigh, the juror said: "We know what the verdict should be."

Nigh said the judge should have had a hearing to determine whether the jury had been tainted.

Connelly characterized the comment as offhand, pointing out the juror never said what the verdict should be.

But Circuit Judge Mike Murphy interjected, "I don't understand the possible harm there could have been by holding a hearing."

Nigh was a member of McVeigh's defense team at the trial and replaced Stephen Jones as lead attorney after Jones and McVeigh had a falling out last summer.

He told the appeals court that the defense was wrong to ignore a Dallas Morning News story about a purported confession by McVeigh. The newspaper ran the story after prospective jurors had been summoned.

Nigh said the defense had hoped the issue would go away and didn't want to draw attention to it.

"We made a serious judgment mistake," he said.

When the alleged confession was raised a second time by Playboy magazine, defense attorneys asked Matsch to move the trial or delay its start. He refused.

Nigh said publicity about the alleged confession poisoned the prospective jurors' minds.

Connelly discounted that argument, saying the prospective jurors agreed to set aside their opinions. He said, "Judge Matsch found this was a very diligent jury."

Iraq foreign minister pledges to cooperate with U. N. officials about illegal firearms

UNITED NATIONS — Seeking to carve out new support on the Security Council, Iraq's foreign minister pledged Tuesday to cooperate with the United Nations to refute "lies and allegations" that Baghdad still possesses illegal arms.

At the same time, Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf raised objections to U.N. parameters for future arms searches of presidential sites, raising the specter of further brinkmanship about Baghdad's weapons programs.

Al-Sahhaf on Tuesday repeated a longtime Iraqi claim that his country destroyed all banned weapons by the end of 1991, accusing the United States and Britain of acting on a vendetta against Iraq.

But the chief U.N. weapons inspector said Iraq itself has acknowledged possession of banned munitions after 1991. Richard Butler said his teams had found artillery shells with perfectly good chemical warfare agent within them.

A Feb. 23 agreement between Iraq and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan called for Baghdad to open all sites, including eight presidential compounds, to U.N. arms inspectors. The agreement averted a serious threat of military confrontation.

U.N. monitors later visited the eight presidential sites, which Iraq had been notified would be searched, and reported finding no banned weapons.

Despite his pledge Tuesday to cooperate with the United Nations, al-Sahhaf took issue with the U.N. interpretation of the agreement.

Annan has said the pact provided for unlimited access to palace compounds. Al-Sahhaf, though, said Tuesday that the deal guaranteed subsequent visits by inspectors but not unlimited ones.

TOP 10 NEWS STORIES
Kansas State Collegian

During the past few weeks the Collegian has compiled all your votes for the year's top news stories. The results are now in.

FIRE, FIESTA REIGN SUPREME

Thousands of K-State football fans took road trips in December '97 to watch the football team play in its first-ever Alliance Bowl game.

Almost two months later, fire ravaged through parts of Aggieville destroying buildings, businesses and dreams.

Despite the contrast of emotion in each story, these two events were instrumental in shaping the year at the university — they share the top spot in the Collegian's reader survey of the top-10 news stories of the school year.

Concluding the team's first 11-1 season, fans traveled more than a thousand miles and through at least three states to the deserts of Tempe, Ariz., to attend the 27th Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. The Wildcats left with a win. Syracuse was less fortunate.

On a more somber note, the partial devastation of historic Aggieville also shares the top spot. Decades of tradition could not contain the fire. Three hours after the Manhattan Fire Department responded to the call, the blaze was under control, and business owners began sifting through the rubble, inspecting the damage.

The fire destroyed Adventure Travel, Club Karrington and Greek's Pizzeria and did heavy damage to shops on either side.

Nearly 20 percent of the student body gave its opinion about creating a student privilege fee to help pay for an expansion to KSU Stadium last November. Results indicated 49 percent of students supported creation of the fee — 11 percentage points short of what was needed.

This story, which ranked third, demonstrated students' dislike of additional fees. The estimated $11 million project would have increased student seating from 7,500 to up to 10,000 seats, among other improvements.

In the fourth-ranked story, franchises moving into the K-State Student Union sparked concern about commercialization of the Union, but officials said its goal will not change. Surveys concluded the Union was not meeting students' needs, and adding merchants was a popular idea among students.

The arrests of two of K-State's most prominent athletes in February rounds out the top 5. Starting quarterback Michael Bishop was arrested on one count of battery and two counts of aggravated battery at 1:55 a.m. on Feb. 22. All charges were later dropped.

In an unrelated case, basketball forward Wilbert E. "Manny" Dies was arrested for transporting an open container of alcohol, obstruction of legal process, possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia 18 minutes later.

A bill that would have created an 85-cent per-credit-hour privilege fee for Hale Library needed a two-thirds majority to be passed and lacked the required support in the Student Senate. This story shares the No. 5 position.

The bill would have created a $328,000 student fee to be added to other funds from the Kansas Legislature and KSU Foundation.

After $30 million and five years of construction, Farrell Library made the transformation to Hale Library during a dedication ceremony Oct. 5, 1997 — one of four stories tied for the seventh spot.

Much of Manhattan shut down for a winter storm that swept into the city in mid-March. Some area roads, including Interstate 70, were closed. Although the Union also was closed, classes remained open.

During campus elections in March, Tracey Mann and Andy Macklin were victorious as student body president and vice president, beating out their opponents Greg Davis and Jim Boomer.

Improved lighting for Denison Avenue crosswalks is the last of the top 10. After an accident involving a pedestrian at a crosswalk near Denison and Platt Street, action was taken to upgrade three area crosswalks.

Other crosswalk improvements will take place in 1999, when funds from the City/University Tax Fund are available, with the Denison crosswalk improvements being funded by the university. The improvements will make conditions safer for pedestrians who use the crosswalks, particularly at night.

Student leaders move toward campus diversity

In the first month of their term, the student body president and vice president, Tracey Mann and Andy Macklin, have already made good on one promise.

Last Thursday, Mann and Macklin met with leaders from multicultural campus organizations. They sent out invitation e-mails and then reminders to the leaders.

This meeting was an attempt to open lines of communication and begin a working relationship between Student Governing Association and the students involved in the multicultural campus groups.

If this is an accurate indication of the open-door practices of this new administration, it's a good sign. Hopefully, it's just the first step in a promising change on campus.

Students on this campus, especially leaders in occasionally overlooked multicultural groups, might be skeptical. In a sense of fairness, students should give this practice a fighting chance and participate in the change.

The student leaders from each of the multicultural campus clubs and organizations should take this opportunity seriously. In addition to attending meetings, the leaders should take advantage of this opportunity to further education and awareness about their organizations.

This administration did the right thing in recognizing the student leadership of these organizations and the hard work and dedication of individual students. Obviously, Mann and Macklin believe these student leaders have an important voice, so participate and be heard.

Some groups might feel under-represented, and this invitation to dialogue is a chance to get more involved in the education of the student body, not just an increased participation in SGA.

In some aspects, this campus is not extremely diverse. However, this is an opportunity to learn about the diversity of individual experiences and interests.

The mating game

Human beings, animals share similar tactics in finding partners

VIEWPOINT

JASON RUCKER

Jason is a senior in pre-vetinary medicine. You can send e-mail to Jason at anubis@ksu.edu.

Buds are bursting, flowers are blooming, birds are singing and building their nests, and the squirrels are zipping after each other like it's prom night.

Spring is here, and as Robin Williams put it, "It's nature crying out, LET'S PARTY!"

That's right, mating season is in full swing for many of our native animals. Those of you who frequent Aggieville know that for the animals down there it's always mating season. But, back to the subject. I've noticed a lot of interesting things in comparing our species mating games with those of our fellow animals.

We like to consider ourselves animals, but some of the things we do make such a statement suspect at best. Our society has become so complex that the simplest of things are no longer considered when choosing a mate.

In the wild, mates are chosen largely on traits which would contribute to survivability, such as strength, speed and intelligence. Individuals who display these traits are proving they will pass on favorable genes to their offspring, thus making them a good choice for a mate who will allow the bloodlines of both parents to continue. The methods for testing these skills are extremely variable from species to species.

For prairie chickens, defending a territory and dancing in a certain way might attract a hen. For weaverbirds, building an elaborate and sturdy nest just might meet the approval of a female. Lions simply take over a pride by brute force and thus demonstrate their superior strength.

In each case, traits needed for survival are demonstrated by the male, and the female generally chooses the male who impresses her. In my experience, this isn't too far off from humans, in that the males generally attempt to impress females in one way or another, while the females play a significant role in accepting or rejecting a suitor. 'Fess up fellas, we've all put on the moves and then been shot down in flames at some point in time.

One glaring difference is in what we do to attract a mate. Not long ago, human males acquired their mates by demonstrating their skills and survivability. This was done in many cultures by giving animals, grain and other goods to the family of the bride, thus proving you would be able to provide for her and any children you might have. Later ownership of land and social status verified a male's allegedly superior genes. Today our standards are even more varied.

Females take a more active stance in seeking out men — which is good, spread the rejection around. Traits that have become of the utmost importance in today's society have little to nothing to do with the health or genotype of individuals. Common ideology is the biggest factor affecting a person's attraction and desire to date a given person. While in the long term this has obvious benefits to the couple, it might lead to reduced vigor of our species as nearly all individual's genes are passed on, regardless of their ability to survive and compete. This issue is obviously highly debatable and a product of our increasingly complex society.

Though it's doubtful other animals will ever deal with these concepts. I don't foresee a bull striding up to a heifer with the line, "Howdy, nice brand. Can I get you some alfalfa? So what are your views on dehorning?"

The issue of our own gene pool has been discussed with increasing interest in the scientific community, particularly with regard to cloning and disease resistance. The quality of the gene pool will likely become a prominent issue in the future. "Hello, can I buy you a drink? Would you like to see my genotype?"

Unpaid internships require many hours, cause financial problems for students

VIEWPOINT

DAVID FAIRBANKS

Dave is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send e-mail to Dave at jolld@ksu.edu.

Well, it's April 29, and May is ready to jump up and bite us in the rear. The weather's getting nicer and everything's turning green. The usual barrage of tan legs and skimpy shorts already are showing their faces on campus.

Like clockwork, all the GQ dudes are out walking their dogs with their shirts off, hoping to snag a whistle from a passing convertible full of sorority girls. And, of course, that tingling burn in everyone's gut known as spring fever is getting too intense to bear.

With such a wonderful seasonal change in our midst, you'd think there would be nothing but good vibes and pleasant thoughts running through my head. Well, in a perfect world, that would be the case. But this world is anything but perfect, and my thoughts are anything but pleasant.

Even though May means warm weather and the end of school, it also means suffering through the last week of classes, finals and preparing for the poor house.

Once school is over and everyone hopefully has survived, the bliss of a summer full of freedom then should ensue. But that's not the way it always works. This is the case for those of us who choose to take a summer internship.

Now, don't get me wrong, internships serve a wonderful purpose. They give us experience in our chosen field, help us gain valuable knowledge and sometimes get us jobs. However, in my case, there's one big piece of the happiness puzzle that's missing. Money!

This may or may not be the case for other fields, but in mine it's almost unheard of to find a paying internship. Either there are far too many people trying to get into television, or the business is monopolized by some mad scientist bent on making aspiring TV reporters suffer. OK, I guess it's that there are too many of us.

Now, I can understand that TV stations don't need to pay their interns because they can find someone just as easily to do it for free. But what I don't understand is K-State's 360-hour internship requirement. Because of this requirement, students like myself have to endure 360 working hours with no compensation whatsoever. To put it bluntly, that's working full time for 10 weeks with no pay, all in the name of requirements.

In my case, those 360 hours have to be squeezed into the summer months. Because of my class loads and paying jobs during the year, I have no time to spend on a fall or spring internship. This basically leaves me no choice but to become an indentured servant for a couple months. Sure, you could split the required hours in half and work two summers in a row, but that doesn't take away from the fact that you're still working 360 hours for no pay at all.

Oh boy, I can hear people already. "Fairbanks needs to stop complaining. He knew what he was getting into. Besides, internships are necessary."

It's true, they are necessary, and I did know what I was getting into. But is it necessary to require such a large sum of hours? When I start to think about rent, bills, food and my own sanity, I really start to wonder how beneficial this requirement is. I mean, how good is experience when you can't even afford to live through it?

With no time to spend on a paying job this summer, I was forced to turn to my parents. If you've been in college for more than a day, you know the severity of the money talk with your folks. After working through some things, my parents agreed to support me throughout the summer. A high price to pay for a three-hour requirement. In fact, these three credit hours will end up being the most expensive of my entire college career. After factoring in the money my parents will have to shell out to get me through the summer, the total will be in the ballpark of $1,200.

But there's another problem. My little sister will be joining me at K-State next year as an incoming freshman. Oops! Two kids in school at the same time, and only the 18-year-old can help her dad out on the money side of things. After waitressing all summer, I'm sure she'll be in a position where I'll be asking her for money next fall. Unless, of course, I win the lottery.

Now, I'm not trying to rally support for my cause or make people feel sorry for me. I don't need anyone's pity. I'm just publicly asking why, in a field where there are almost no paying internships, do students have to collect such a large sum of internship hours just to graduate? It's just that I'm having trouble trading in my pocketbook for a piece of paper that says "Three Credit Hours." I'd be happier with a piece of paper that says "Two Credit Hours" and a little cash in my pocket.

Why not lessen the requirement load so people can have time to work a paying job? It makes sense to allow someone who's gaining experience the chance to make some money on which to live. I don't know who made the requirements, but whoever it was needs to remember that students have monetary responsibilities, too. They have rent to pay, food to buy, cars to fill with gas and bills to pay. Students are just one step below career individuals and live in the same capitalistic society as the people who made the rules.

I'm glad I have an internship. I'll make connections, gain vital knowledge and increase my chance at success. It's just a shame that while I'm doing all this I won't possess the stability to keep myself alive. I'm also grateful that my parents are in a position to help me out. But what about the others who aren't as lucky as I? Well, I guess that's for the rule makers to decide.

Reader says dance tryouts have lost classy tradition

Editor,

I am writing to voice my displeasure at the turn of events that took place at the Classy Cats tryouts on Saturday. A lot of nasty allegations came from that tryout, and I feel they should be addressed.

First of all, we were taught two routines, a cheer routine and a dance that was called a jazz routine. However, the jazz dance was composed of pirouettes, leaps and turns that I have only witnessed in ballet. I was a member of my high school drill team for four years. We did many jazz routines, and they never consisted of axle turns and pirouettes. From what I have seen of the Classy Cats, they do mostly cheer routines, and that is what I feel we should have been judged on.

I was then angered by the fact that out of the 36 finalists, more than half were recent and former Classy Cat members. If the whole purpose of the tryout was to rehire the old team, then what was the point of dragging more than 100 girls out of their beds that morning?

Thirdly, only one African-American female made the preliminary cut, and she was so light-skinned that I had trouble telling she was black. There was an African-American woman at the tryout who had been a former Classy Cats member, and she still did not make the cut, but all of the other former members did.

We were then to find out that the jazz routine was allegedly a routine the Classy Cats did two years ago. These girls were also witnessed practicing together in the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex a few days before tryouts.

To top it all off, the woman who is in line for the new coaching position was in the back with the judges while the votes were being tabulated. I have never seen a coach involved with the judging in any event, in any way, shape or form.

I am not whining here. I am simply stating that if I am paying my money to attend K-State, I deserve the right to be judged on my ability on a level playing field, instead of being a pawn in a so-called tryout that seemed to be a false front that the Classy Cats can use to show "equal opportunity."

Alumnus compares tradition of football at Big 12 schools

Editor:

I just wanted the students, alumni and faculty of K-State to be made aware of an experience that a friend of mine and I shared this past weekend.

My name is Troy Horton, and I graduated from K-State in 1991. Currently, I live in Austin, Texas, where I am the National Tournament Director for a golf mini-tour. Saturday, I attended the University of Texas' "Spring Football Jamboree" at Memorial Stadium. The open house was awesome. Several National Championship trophies, Earl Campbell's Heisman, Ricky Williams' Doak Walker Award, et cetera.

A total of 21,000 people attended the Longhorn spring game, following a 4-7 campaign in 1997. I went to the game with my girlfriend, who happens to be a University of Missouri alumna, and although we were treated nicely by the Texas alumni with whom we visited, we noticed a general disregard for K-State.

The flag corps had flags for all the Big 12 schools except K-State. They did have 2 for Missouri, though. Later, when the attendance was announced to be more than 21,000, some UT grad made a crack about there not being that many at last year's K-State-KU game.

On one hand, this was kind of a rude awakening to a great football tradition. But better yet, it was an exciting introduction to an even greater football tradition that is still under construction. We will be traveling to Manhattan from Austin this weekend for the K-State spring game and are hoping to join considerably more than 21,000 fans. It will be interesting to compare and contrast the two events separated by just a week.

My opinion might be slightly biased, however — every person a Wildcat.

Mann, Macklin implement diversity project

What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board supports this action. See page 4.

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Within a month of taking over the offices of student body president and vice president, Tracey Mann and Andy Macklin have started on one of their projects for next year.

MANN

The two said they want to increase diversity on campus and make students more aware of multicultural groups that already exist at K-State.

"We saw a real need to open up the lines of communication," Mann said. "And all those groups are our constituents also, and we definitely want to serve them and learn of their needs."

Mann said he and Macklin want to hold round-table discussions with representatives from K-State's 24 multicultural groups to see how Student Governing Association can meet all the groups' needs.

So far, there has been one meeting with representatives from some of the groups.

"We felt like we had a really successful meeting doing that and just educating ourselves," Mann said. "And therefore we can educate the student government just about the needs of the under-represented groups."

For the last few weeks, Macklin has attended Hispanic American Leadership Organization and Black Student Union meetings, and Macklin said he and Mann plan to assign cabinet members to attend other multicultural meetings.

MACKLIN

The president and vice president also attended the American Ethnic Studies Student Association Diversity Initiative workshop.

"We learned a lot about ourselves and other cultures at K-State," Mann said. "And we brainstormed ideas on how to promote diversity at K-State."

HALO president Leo Prieto said he is excited about the efforts Mann and Macklin are making to increase diversity.

"I think they are making a great effort and showing a great initiative," he said. "It's not like they don't have other stuff to do. They've shown a commitment to it instead of just talking, like most people do."

Prieto said for the project to be successful, Mann and Macklin need to continue attending meetings, continue round-table discussions and attend events put on by multicultural organizations.

"When we have different events to promote, they need to be visible," he said. "They need to go to these things and support these things."

Prieto said the groups need more interaction with the whole student body, not just members of SGA.

Macklin said he and Mann plan to promote multicultural events to the rest of the student body and to attend the events. He said he hopes other SGA members do the same.

Multicultural Student Organization Coordinator Dawnielle Robinson said Mann and Macklin's efforts are greatly appreciated.

"It's a two-fold deal. They gain something and the multicultural organizations feel someone is taking an interest in them as well," Robinson said. "When people take a significant interest, that always helps; multicultural student organizations can't do everything by themselves."

Robinson said she hopes Mann and Macklin talk to administrators about diversity, too.

"I hope they use their pull with administration and hopefully branch out in that matter," she said.

Macklin said increasing diversity at K-State is important because many groups feel underrepresented at K-State.

"Some groups feel a little bit left out," he said. "And those groups have members who contribute to our campus in great ways. There is no reason someone should come to K-State and feel left out."

"SOME GROUPS FEEL A LITTLE BIT LEFT OUT. AND THOSE GROUPS HAVE MEMBERS WHO CONTRIBUTE TO OUR CAMPUS IN GREAT WAYS."

Chiefs' owner bids on buying Royals team

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Lamar Hunt, whose Kansas City Chiefs play across the parking lot from Kauffman Stadium, announced Tuesday he had made a preliminary bid to buy the Kansas City Royals.

Hunt announced a partnership with Western Resources Inc., a large regional utility.

Hunt said the motivation for the offer to buy a team that has lost money in recent years was to make sure it remained in Kansas City.

"It was out of a fear that there might not be an owner step forward that would keep the team here," he said. "We have a long-term lease at Arrowhead Stadium. I think it has 17 more years. It would be inconceivable for me to look out from Arrowhead for 17 years and see that stadium boarded up. I can't imagine a sign hanging there saying 'No game today.'"

The Royals Board of Directors issued a statement saying bids were being forwarded to their investment banker for review. The statement did not say how many bids were received.

"At this point, we are optimistic that this auction process will lead to the sale of the Royals to a strong owner who will keep the team in Kansas City," said Mike Herman, president of the Royals and chairman of the committee overseeing the auction.

Tuesday was the deadline to submit preliminary bids for the American League franchise. Hunt said his bid is competitive but would not elaborate.

Bidders signed confidentiality agreements in which they agreed not to discuss their bids or Royals finances. The bidders were given thick books detailing team finances.

The Royals board had set a minimum price of $75 million.

"The ball is now in the Royals' court," Hunt said.

The NFL club owner said talks between his family and Western Resources began last month. He said ownership will be divided evenly if the bid goes through, with the Hunts the managing partner.

Western Resources is based in Topeka. Chief executive officer John Hayes said the joint bid is designed to keep the Royals where they are.

"We could not think of any better way to make that happen ... than to join in this partnership with the Hunt family," he said.

The Royals have been without an owner since thier founder, Ewing Kauffman, died in 1993. Herman has said he hoped to have a new owner identified by the All-Star break in July.

In addition to Hunt, two other publicly known bidders are a group led by former Royals star George Brett and his brother Bobby, and New York lawyer Miles Prentice, who owns a minor-league team.

Hunt said he and Brett had discussed a partnership — an ownership group that would have been extremely popular locally — but that he and Brett decided to pursue separate paths.

It was not known whether the Bretts had made a formal bid.

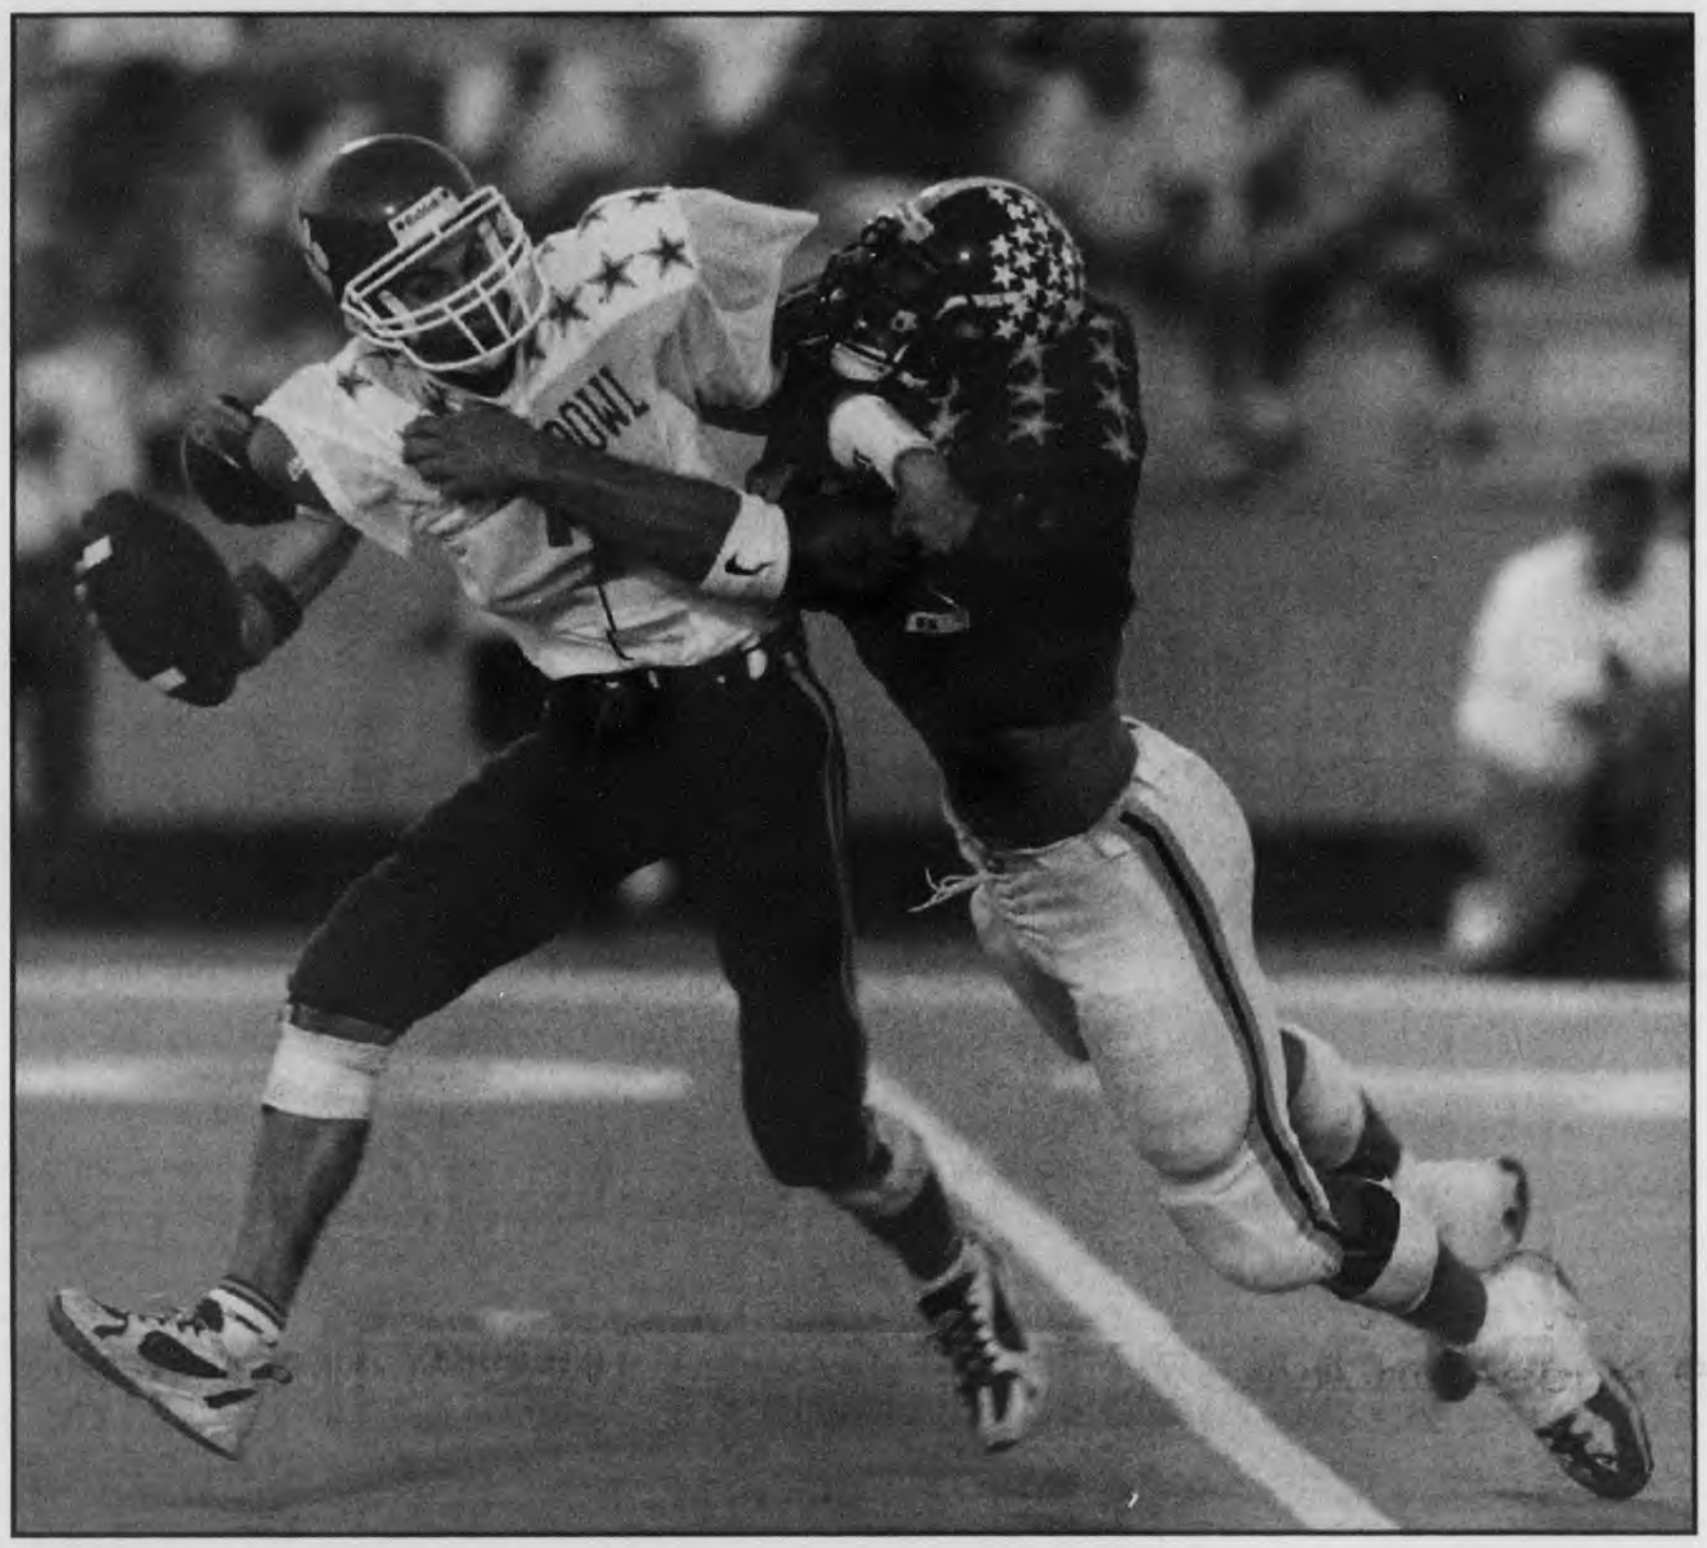
Hunt has owned the Chiefs, who moved to Kansas City in 1963, since their founding in 1960 as the Dallas Texans of the old American Football League. Hunt Sports also owns a percentage of the NBA's Chicago Bulls and two Major League Soccer teams, the Kansas City Wizards and the Columbus Crew.

Hunt owned part of a minor-league team in the Dallas-Fort Worth area in the 1960s but has not been involved with professional baseball since. As recently as four weeks ago, Hunt said he had not considered owning the Royals.

Hunt said he changed his mind because he wanted to be sure the team stayed in Kansas City.

"The Hunts add a dimension of success, a continuity," he said. "We wanted to get far, far away from the feeling that the Royals are going to move, because we are absolutely committed to keeping the team in Kansas City."

After Tuesday, the Royals' investment banker, J.P. Morgan & Co., is to review the bids. J.P. Morgan may ask the bidders for clarifications, Royals spokesman Dean Davison said.



The team's screening committee, composed of three Royals directors, is to meet next week to consider the bids. Bidders may ask to see more data on the team.

After that, serious negotiations are likely with any bidders who submitted competitive bids. The Royals will ask the finalists whether they will sign an agreement to keep the team in Kansas City.

Royals directors will pick the new owner, who might not necessarily have submitted the highest bid but who appears most likely and capable of running the team well and keeping it in Kansas City.

Retaining the team in Kansas City was the main wish of Kauffman, who founded the Royals. Herman has said that although the directors wish to get the most money possible in the sale, they would take a lesser bid for a greater assurance the team would remain.

FROSH NO MORE

AS A SENIOR REPRESENTING DOUGLASS HIGH SCHOOL, MONTY BEISEL TAKES DOWN THE OPPOSING QUARTERBACK IN THE 1997 SHRINE BOWL. BEISEL, A DEFENSIVE END, WAS THE ONLY WILDCAT TRUE FRESHMAN TO SEE PLAYING TIME LAST SEASON.

Beisel only freshman not putting on game face for 1st time

Nov. 8, 1997, was a red-letter day for sophomore defensive end Monty Beisel.

Actually, it could have been a red-and-blue letter day. Beisel was recruited heavily by the team he recorded his first collegiate sack against — intrastate rival Kansas.

"Getting into the Kansas game and getting a sack felt really good, because growing up as a Kansas kid and seeing the Kansas/K-State rivalry was really big for me," Beisel said. "I just hope things like that continue for me in the future."

The only Kansas high school player to be named a Parade all-American in 1996 chose to be a Wildcat, not at all expecting to be on the field as a freshman. None of the 14 freshman recruits expected to see the field in 1997.

Injuries to the defensive line early in the season prompted head coach Bill Snyder to put Beisel into the Bowling Green game Sept. 27. After a bout with the nerves, Beisel recovered a fumble and recorded one unassisted tackle for a loss of four yards.

Now, his 13 true freshman teammates face their first time on the field in Division-I football. Beisel was divided about losing his redshirt year last season.

"I've thought about it a lot, and in some ways it hurt me, because I lost a year," he said. "In other ways, it helped me, because I have experience that other guys don't have."

It's hard to imagine how actual playing time can be a drawback. But when the rest of the freshman class is on the same page and one player has an edge, the pressure seems greater, Beisel said.

"I've tried to look at all the positives about it," he said. "I'm looking forward to going into spring ball with that extra experience that the younger guys don't have."

That experience has little importance in spring practice. Losing so few players to graduation leaves few openings on the field, and Beisel said he knows how hard it will be to increase his playing time.

> "I'M LOOKING FORWARD TO GOING INTO SPRING BALL WITH THAT EXTRA EXPERIENCE THAT THE YOUNGER GUYS DON'T HAVE."
> MONTY BEISEL
> DEFENSIVE END

"I'm looking forward to the spring game and showing the coaches that I am capable of being a player and getting out on the field and getting some playing time, but with the quality of talent that we have, it'll be tough to establish myself as one of the best," he said. "Until I do that, it's going to be a long road."

Snyder said he is impressed with Beisel's performance so far this spring. All starting positions are up for grabs, and Beisel has as good a shot as anyone, the coach said.

"He's doing very well," Snyder said. "He's having some of the best practices he's ever had. He's getting close. It's going to be competitive."

The option to redshirt Beisel for his sophomore season is a valid one, but not one Snyder said he thought Beisel was interested in.

"I don't think that's what he wants to do," Snyder said. "That's going to be Monty's choice, and when the time comes, we'll sit down and talk about it."

Beisel's teammates said they have noticed his work ethic in practice. Sophomore safety Jarrod Cooper said Beisel's improvements are noticeable as well, and he said he could compete for a starting position.

"He's gotten bigger and stronger, a lot better," Cooper said. "Yeah, I think he can (compete). But not Darren Howard's spot. Darren Howard is Darren Howard."

Senior running back Eric Hickson said Beisel still has a lot to learn, but he's picking it up fast with the help of his teammates. Beisel said he agreed the learning process is his greatest challenge.

"I think the toughest thing is mental, getting on the field and being tough, and understanding every aspect of the game," he said.

Beisel has been practicing against the No. 1 squad this spring, and Hickson said he's hanging with those players easily.

"He's making plays," Hickson said. "That's his job."

Jordan will reign in all his glory again this year, next year — as long as Krause keeps him

VIEWPOINT

JESS LOUK

Jess is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Jess at toddvs@ksu.edu.

The NBA playoffs are in full swing, and my thoughts are ready to savor every minute of Michael Jordan's final run to his birthright — another NBA Championship.

Yep, this could be it for Jordan, Scottie Pippen and Phil Jackson. With various supporting casts, these three have engineered the most dominating run in the history of the NBA.

But let's forget about Pippen, Jackson, Steve Kerr, Horace Grant, John Paxson or Stacey King — it's all about Jordan. Without Jordan, those guys all would be ringless. Yes, we are watching the decline of the Roman empire of basketball.

The Bulls have been so dominant. If Jordan had elected not to chase his dream of playing some baseball, spitting some sunflower seeds and whiffing at curve balls for a couple of seasons, the Bulls would be claiming their eighth-straight championship this year.

Eight straight.

There hasn't been a team in the NBA that could compete with a Jordan-led team since Magic Johnson and Larry Bird retired.

Forget that tall guy in Houston with two championship trophies and more post moves than Kevin McHale on crack. Hakeem Olajuwon's Houston Rocket championship teams couldn't have taken the Jordan-led Bulls to even five games.

I guess this is the column where I insult you with the obvious — Jordan is the best basketball player ever to walk the face of the earth.

Bar none.

Since he hit that jump shot against Georgetown in 1982, clinching the national championship for North Carolina, Jordan has inspired us — not only with his play, but also with his poise, his grace, his class, his smile and, let's face it, his passion for life and the game of basketball.

When Jordan was in his prime, we watched him take the game of basketball to places it had never seen and will never see again. He made the best players in the world appear as inept as Ken Starr trying to make charges stick against our Teflon president.

Jordan is that good.

There was the time when he dropped 63 on the Larry Bird-led Celtics in the playoffs, an NBA record. In the last regular game that season, Jordan torched the Hawks for 61. In one stretch of that game he scored 23-straight, an NBA record. Against the Charles Barkley-led Suns, Jordan dropped 41 in the NBA finals. Another NBA record.

Those 63 still represent the most points ever scored by anyone in an NBA playoff game, and 41 is the highest ever in a finals game.

Yes, Jordan was and is the extraordinary personified.

The best on earth, indeed.

In fact, if they play basketball on any other planets, I'd put my money on Jordan. I don't care if this planet has 12-foot basketball-playing behemoths with hops like Dr. J's and jump shots like Larry Bird's. I'm taking Jordan.

Jordan is a four-time league MVP.

Jordan is a five-time NBA Finals MVP.

Jordan is an 11-time NBA All-Star.

Jordan is one of two players in the history of the NBA to score more than 3,000 points in a season.

Oh, did I mention he has won six championships? Yes, I'm already counting the one he will win this year.

We could go on and on with Jordan's accomplishments. So why is Bulls General Manager Jerry Krause forcing Jackson out — in turn forcing Jordan into retirement?

Jordan has said several times that if Phil goes, he goes.

At this point, if Krause took one of those fishing jobs in Alaska for $25 an hour and never returned, the world would be a better place.

This season, the brilliant Krause shelled out $6 million to Jackson, and he refused to renegotiate Scottie Pippen's contract. This left Pippen making roughly $2 million a year. While Krause is driving away Jordan and the coach who has helped bring six championships to Chicago, he also is forcing Pippen out.

Mama always said, stupid is as stupid does.

Could someone please explain the logic?

It has been reported Krause thinks the Bulls are old. So Krause just is thinking of his franchise's future? Could that be? Ridding a franchise of its primary, secondary and tertiary draws is a great concoction for success. At least Jerry's seat will be full.

Here's your future, Jerry — if you fire Jackson and Jordan retires, you'll never be able to walk the streets of Chicago in any degree of safety as long as you draw air.

Luncheon honors scholarship winners

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State honored a few of its brightest students at a luncheon Tuesday for the Truman and Goldwater Scholarship winners.

K-State has two Truman Scholars and four Goldwater Scholars this year.

Truman Scholarship winners are Tim Riemann, senior in agricultural economics, and Ryan Bock, senior in political science.

Goldwater Scholarship winners are Tristan Kimbrell, senior in biology; Jace Kohlmeier, senior in computer science; Wesley Schawe, senior in mathematics; and Teresa Sweat, junior in biology.

President Jon Wefald, who addressed the group, said the luncheon was intended to honor K-State's academic successes.

"It's a way to celebrate academic excellence in every way, shape and form," Wefald said.

"We can't praise our students often enough."

The luncheon was attended by friends and family members of the scholars, administrators, SGA representatives and members of the Truman and the Goldwater Committees.

BOCK

RIEMANN

"The students work very hard in applying for the scholarships," Beth Powers, academic adviser, said. "Winning, of course, is one of the greatest rewards. It's so nice to be able to share that with their families, and also the other candidates. Also, being able to offer thanks to the people who helped them."

Wefald said Truman and Goldwater scholars should be commended.

Nobody ever thinks it's routine if a football team goes to a bowl game every year, but many consider scholarships routine, Wefald said.

K-State is known for producing scholars, he said.

KIMBRELL

SCHAWE

K-State ranks first among all four-year public colleges and universities in the United States in the number of Goldwater Scholars it produces and is second only to Princeton University as compared to all four-year colleges and universities.

The university is also first of all public institutions in the number of Truman scholars received and sixth of all public and private colleges and universities.

Wefald said those facts particularly are impressive because most of K-State's student population is from Kansas. Private institutions such as Harvard University and Princeton draw the best students from across the country.

KOHLMEIER

SWEAT

Powers encouraged all students to apply for scholarships.

"I think sometimes students have the impression that only elite scholars with only perfect grades and perfect test scores can apply, and that's not the case. I want to be sure that K-State students know that," Powers said.

Interested students can see Powers in the College of Arts and Sciences office in Eisenhower Hall.

The hearing provides an opportunity for discussion of the proposed changes to the regulations governing traffic and parking on the roads, streets, driveways and parking facilities at the Salina Campus of the Kansas State University. The following is a summary of the substance of the proposed changes.

General:
The format of the regulations has been substantially changed to increase ease of reading and understanding, while reducing redundancy.

Major Changes:
Residence Hall students will no longer be permitted to drive and park on campus outside the Residence Hall lots during the normal class day.

Parking fees will be increased 20%, to $20 for students, $34 for faculty and staff, and $8 for motorcycle permits.

The Family Center at K-State and the Kaw Valley Dietetic Association will co-sponsor "HIV/AIDS — Where Do We Go from Here?" at 9 a.m. May 8, at the Pozez Educational Center in Topeka.

The conference will cover a wide variety of AIDS-related issues and will offer an interdisciplinary approach to treatment of HIV/AIDS for medical practitioners, family therapists and all who offer support to victims of AIDS.

"The conference is multidisciplinary," said Diane Sanders, chair of the conference planning committee and graduate student in the School of Family Studies and Human Services. "It is for all professions that relate to AIDS."

The conference will focus on promoting a team approach to helping those infected with HIV.

"We want to get everyone involved, including the patient," Sanders said. "The conference is about facing the issue with an inclusive approach. This means practitioners, patients and family members."

Conference presenters include keynote speaker Larry W. Rumans, Associate Clinical Professor of Medicine at the University of Kansas, and Sherry Karen Baer, executive director of the Topeka AIDS Project.

In four sessions, presenters will cover topics in future trends of HIV/AIDS treatment, Nutritional management of AIDS, Pediatric HIV/AIDS and Co-operative treatment of AIDS.

"The goal of the conference was providing education and information for the infected and the people who work with them," said Maria V. Masi, graduate student in marriage and family therapy and conference speaker on pediatric HIV/AIDS.

Masi, who has worked with many types of AIDS infection as a clinical social worker, said she hopes the conference will broaden awareness.

"Most people don't think about children infected by their mothers, or about the increasing rates of heterosexually infected teens," she said.

The conference workshops are designed for professionals and students in areas such as dietetics, social work, counseling, psychology and medicine, but anyone interested is welcome to attend.

Nichols Hall to undergo renovations

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

The Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance will have to make a few sacrifices to accommodate the construction scheduled to begin next month in Nichols Hall, David Procter, associate professor and head of the department, said.

Procter said there will be no summer Nichols Theatre productions this year. The past few summers, the department has put on about two plays per summer, usually a comedy and a children's play.

"This summer there'll be lots of noise and dust," he said. "We realized that this summer is not going to work."

Last summer the department put on "Charlie's Aunt," and two one-act plays, "Sister Mary Ignatius" and "The Actor's Nightmare."

Tyler Lansdown, sophomore in theater, said he worked on last summer's performance of "Charlie's Aunt," and although he enjoyed summer theater, the construction of four new studios for dance and theater classes supersedes what he would get out of working on another play this summer.

"I did a summer show last year," Lansdown said. "What we're getting is more beneficial. We'll have a high-tech, quality place to hone our craft. It's necessary to do."

Procter said the theater also will be scaling back the set designs for its fall productions.

One adjustment for fall sets will be not using the trap door in the center of the Nichols Theatre stage floor. The trap door is used for scenes depicting burials or ghosts rising from below, and using the door might conflict with the construction of the studio that will be directly below the theater, he said.

"We want to make sure everything works right," he said.

Although the new studios are scheduled to be ready for classes in the fall, Procter said a few of the department's classes still will be in Ahearn Field House, where the dance studios are now.

"The studios are supposed to be complete by August 1, but they don't know for sure," he said. "But in the spring, we'll make sure we're ready to go."

Lansdown said he's disappointed not to have the opportunity to work on any productions this summer, but the new facilities will be worth the sacrifice.

"It won't kill us," he said.

Royal Purple distributed in free-speech zone

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

More than 4,500 books at 512 pages a book make for a heavy load for the 16-person Royal Purple staff.

Distribution of the 1998 Royal Purple yearbook began Monday and will continue outside the K-State Student Union through today.

"We've had good response from students," said J.J. Kuntz, editor of the yearbook and senior in hotel and restaurant management. "We really targeted the students this year with personalized quotes in the opening section, personalized stories and stories written by the athletes."

The 1998 yearbook is the 89th Royal Purple and marks the 107th year of K-State yearbooks.

Beginning in 1891, the first yearbooks at K-State, with names such as the Banner, the Bell Clapper and the Sledge, were class books produced by and distributed to the senior classes of Kansas State Agricultural College. They included portraits of seniors with interesting facts such as height, weight, hair color, political beliefs and favorite expressions.

In 1904, the books faced elimination, so the staff created the idea of a college annual to replace the class book. In 1909, this book was renamed the Royal Purple, or RP, after the school color. On average, it was about 100 pages.

"The tradition of the Royal Purple is that it tells the complete story of the campus. It's always done that with broad coverage at an affordable price," said Linda Puntney, adviser of the yearbook and assistant director of Student Publications Inc. "The pages are chock full of information, quality coverage and memories."

Through the years, the book has changed in size and style. In 1938, the RP became the first book in the nation to add a tip-on, a color photograph pasted to the cover.

The next year it also became the first yearbook to emboss images on its division pages, which was a popular trend in the 1980s. The 1941 book was the first book in the nation to have a full-color cover.

In 1970, the book was the largest book in the nation at 704 pages. It also had record sales with 8,500 copies sold.

The book also achieved campus recognition between 1915 and 1970 with events such as the Royal Purple popularity contest, the Royal Purple Ball and the Royal Purple queen.

Today, the Royal Purple is 512 pages and prints 4,800 books each year. It still achieves firsts by being one of the first yearbooks in the nation to apply lamination to its color photos and to include a CD-ROM supplement.

"Something different about the RP from other college yearbooks is that it's really consistent from year to year. It's something the students can rely on," Kuntz said, "but we also like to try different things and be trendsetters."

Puntney said the CD-ROM supplement, which first was included with the yearbook last year, was a successful addition to the book and has helped increase sales.

"The CD-ROM in conjunction with the yearbook takes us places we've never gone before. You're experiencing stories as they happen," she said.

Puntney said this tradition of excellence, in addition to treating the yearbook as more than just a photo album, has been the reason the RP is one of the most-awarded yearbooks in the nation. It is the only yearbook to win both the Gold Crown, presented by the Columbia Scholastic Press Association, and the Pacemaker award, presented by the Associated Collegiate Press, every year since 1990. However, she said, they do not produce the book for the awards.

"It really doesn't matter if we win awards if the student body doesn't like the book," Puntney said. "Student response says whether it's an award winner."

Pre-purchased books can be picked up today in the Union with a receipt or form of ID.

After today, they can be picked up in Kedzie 103. Books still can be purchased for $29.95.

Cassandra & Jack

There are two sides to every story. After an ugly breakup a few months ago, Jack and Cassie, the Collegian's advice columnists, have put their differences aside to lend a hand to those in need.

Dear Jack,

How long after dating a girl do I have to tell her I love her? I've been seeing this girl for about four months now and am wondering when I am supposed to say, "I love you."

Sincerely,
Stuck

Dear Stuck,

You aren't supposed to tell anyone you love them unless you really love them. If you have been with this girl for four months and still don't know whether you love her, perhaps it is time to re-evaluate the relationship.

Cassie

Dear Stuck,

Never say "I love you" under any circumstances. If you are a manly man, you will never fold to society's pressures. Never show any emotion. It's a sign of weakness.

Act like you don't even care that she's around. That is what she really likes. Love is for sissy boys.

Best wishes,
Jack

'Merlin' earns high ratings

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The opening night of "Merlin" gave NBC its best miniseries ratings in more than a decade and helped the network to an easy victory at the outset of the May sweeps period.

Sunday's "Merlin" opening was the highest-rated movie on television since "Jurassic Park" in 1995 and NBC's best miniseries rating since "Fatal Vision" in 1984.

NBC won the week with a 10.7 rating and 18 share, Nielsen Media Research said Tuesday. Second-place CBS had a 9.3 rating and 16 share, followed by ABC's 7.5 rating and 13 share and Fox's 6.6 rating and 11 share.

The May sweeps, one of four months when ratings are watched closely to set local advertising rates, began Thursday.

CBS has won the past two sweeps, but NBC will be tough to beat this month, particularly with the final "Seinfeld" still to come.

Sunday night was a good one for television, with NBC estimating 84 million people tuned in to one of the top-four networks between 9 and 10 p.m. CBS's movie, "Nicholas' Gift," finished ninth for the week, and ABC's showing of "Apollo 13" finished 21st.

CBS's airing of the Academy of Country Music Awards finished a strong 10th for the week, but apparently viewers weren't too anxious to welcome the Ewing clan back. The movie, "Dallas: War of the Ewings" finished 42nd for the week.

"ER" was again the most-watched show of the week.

Fox learned that shootouts beat car chases in the ratings. Its special, "World's Scariest Police Shootouts" outrated its other special, "World's Wildest Police Videos."

The two emerging networks had identical 2.7 ratings, although WB had a 5 share and UPN had a 4.

NBC's "Nightly News" finished first in the evening-news race with a 7.4 rating and 17 share. ABC's "World News Tonight" had a 7.1 rating and 16 share, followed by the "CBS Evening News" at 6.9 and 16.

A rating point represents 980,000 households, or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 98 million TV homes.

Congress narrowly passes bill on restricted abortion rights

by the leading country in the world."

The United States risks losing its voting rights in the U.N. General Assembly if the long-delinquent dues are not paid soon, U.S. and U.N. officials have warned Congress. Still, the U.S. position in the Security Council, where it has veto power, would be unaffected.

The provision is the latest in a string of abortion curbs conservatives in Congress have placed on foreign-aid bills in the past decade. It would prohibit any U.S. payments to the United Nations from being used for international family planning groups that support abortion rights, even if they use their own money to lobby for abortion-law changes.

Gloria Feldt, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said the Senate action was disheartening.

"The president should veto it. The president has said he will veto it. We have no reason to believe he will not veto it," Feldt said in an interview.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's senior Democrat, said Clinton would sign the bill in a flash if it didn't contain the abortion restrictions, calling the Republican action "legislative blackmail."

But Republican leaders urged Clinton to sign the bill.

"He has waved that veto flag time and time again," said Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Jesse Helms, R-N.C. "One way or the other, this is the end of it." Helms joined Lott in suggesting this was the only way Clinton would get the U.N. money and foreign-policy reorganization his administration supports.

The abortion restrictions were added to the legislation last year by House conservatives. Because Tuesday's bill resulted from negotiations between House and Senate lawmakers, it could not be amended further.

Meanwhile, the Senate debated another Clinton administration foreign-policy priority: expanding NATO to add the former Warsaw Pact nations of Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic.

A final vote was expected by week's end. Leaders in both parties have predicted approval by more than the two-thirds vote needed for a treaty.

In working on the bill, the Senate rejected 76-24 a proposed amendment to limit the U.S. share of expansion costs to 25 percent of the total bill. "We shouldn't sign the American taxpayer's name to a blank check," said sponsor Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa.

The administration insists the expansion will cost U.S. taxpayers no more than $400 million over 10 years. Bill sponsors said the amendment would tie U.S. hands in a crisis and make it harder for U.S. weapons manufacturers to compete with European rivals.

In a related move, House and Senate negotiators had their first meeting Tuesday on an emergency spending bill to provide funds for keeping U.S. troops in Bosnia and the Persian Gulf and to provide flood and storm relief at home.

When Clinton sent the bill to Congress last winter, it included the IMF and U.N. money, but Republican leaders set those sections aside.

Members are starting to squirrel little projects into the bill. One project — $1 million for a natural disaster emergency response in Alabama — was line-item vetoed by Clinton in November when it had only a $450,000 price tag. It's sponsor, Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., said the project's needs had increased.

The House negotiators voted 7-6 to accept Senate-approved language letting Albuquerque, N.M., build a road through the Petroglyph National Monument. Some American Indians contend the road would disturb a religious site, and Democrats voted against it.

Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., senior Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, warned that Clinton might veto this bill, too, even though it contains military and disaster-relief funds he wants, saying "the totality of add-ons" could force Clinton to veto it.

E. Coli contamination causes recall of ground beef

▶TAINTED SAMPLE SPURS MEAT-PACKING COMPANY TO RECALL GROUND BEEF.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The country's biggest meat-packing company is recalling more than 282,000 pounds of ground beef nationwide after the discovery of contamination with a virulent strain of E. coli bacteria.

The tainted sample was found during a routine testing program conducted by the U.S. Department of Agriculture on a single package of beef produced April 14 at IBP Inc.'s plant in Joslin, Ill.

The recalled amount represents that entire day's production and possibly was shipped to numerous states, said Jacque Knight, spokesperson for USDA's Food Safety and Inspection Service.

"We consider it a nationwide recall," Knight said on Wednesday.

IBP, based in Dakota City, Neb., said in a statement that 50 retail and food-service customers have been contacted and asked to return the meat to IBP. The beef typically is processed further by grocers and restaurants, so there are no product codes for consumers to check.

"To our knowledge, there has been no illness associated or reported on the product from this date," the IBP statement said. "However, in an abundance of caution, IBP is conducting this voluntary recall."

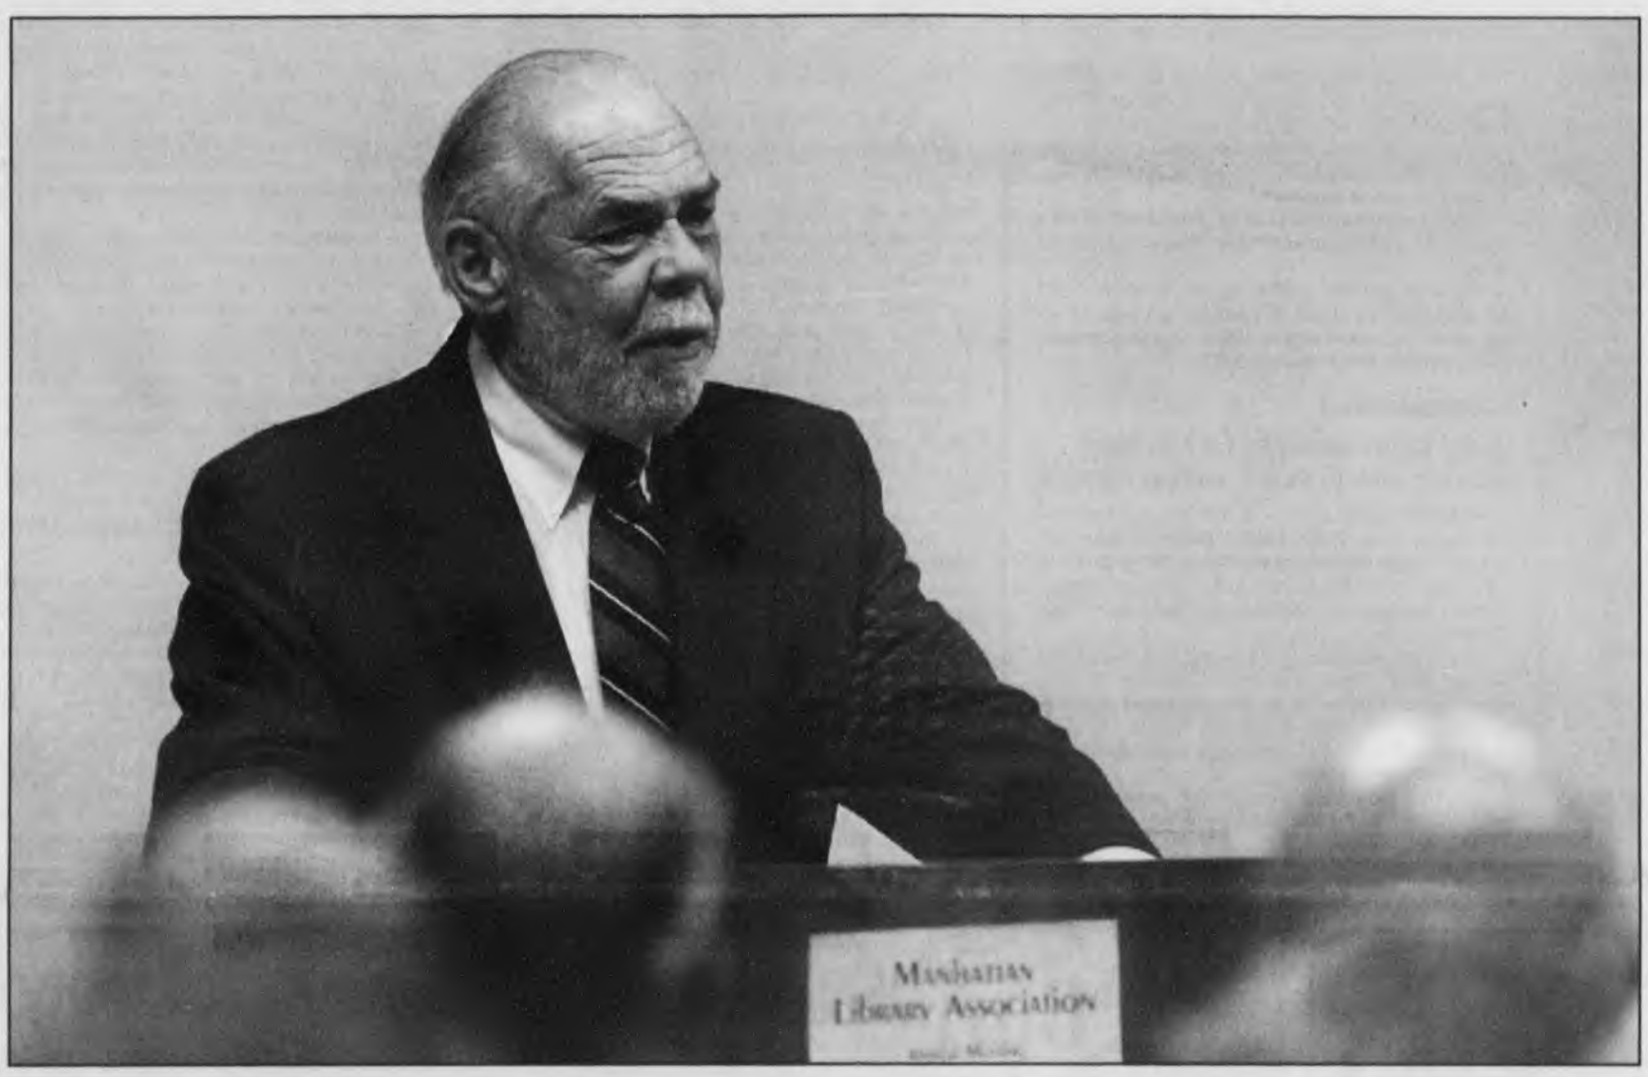
Health departments in all 50 states have been alerted to watch for cases of E. coli, as has the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The Agriculture Department has isolated the DNA of the sample in question, which could be used to determine if any illnesses result from the recalled beef.

Symptoms of infection include abdominal cramps, diarrhea and fever. E. coli, a microbe that gets in meat mainly through contaminated manure, is particularly dangerous for children, the elderly and people with AIDS.

Cooking hamburger to an internal temperature of 160 degrees Fahrenheit will kill the pathogen. Ground beef should never be eaten rare.

The recall is the latest in a series of cases involving E. coli and ground beef, including the record recall of 25 million pounds last summer by Hudson Foods Co. People were sickened in that case, and the financial fallout resulted in Hudson's buyout by Arkansas rival Tyson Foods Inc.

Despite its high profile, E. coli contamination still is relatively rare: The sample found by the Agriculture Department was only the 13th out of some 20,100 tests on beef since 1994.



The IBP plant in Illinois is among those that have implemented a new government-mandated meat inspection system intended to reduce E. coli and salmonella contamination through controls at certain spots along the production line. There are 45 employees at the plant dedicated to food safety.

The IBP statement said the company is reviewing all of its procedures and is installing new technology in its plants, including steam cabinets that prevent contamination on beef carcasses.

"Our company and our industry continue to aggressively research ways to further enhance our food-safety efforts," the company said.

The Agriculture Department later this year will announce rules enabling meat processors to use irradiation on ground beef, which kills E. coli, salmonella and other pathogens.

LIBRARY REOPENS WITH A STAR

CHARLES GUSEWELLE, COLUMNIST FOR THE KANSAS CITY STAR, SPOKE TUESDAY NIGHT AT THE MANHATTAN PUBLIC LIBRARY. GUSEWELLE, WHO ALSO WROTE SIX BOOKS, SPOKE ABOUT SOME OF HIS LIFE AND CAREER EXPERIENCES.

IVAN KOZAR
Collegian

Newspaper columnist brings quick wit to local library

The new three-story atrium wasn't the only interesting thing Tuesday night at Manhattan Public Library. Charles Gusewelle, columnist for The Kansas City Star and author of six books, was on hand to tell some of his favorite stories from his life and career experiences.

With his trademark mix of humor and heart, Gusewelle led the audience of nearly 150 through the native villages of Africa, down the Lena River in Siberia, from the coup in Moscow to the streets of Paris.

He told stories about one of his favorite subjects of all: his late beloved hunting dog, Rufus. His collected experiences with Rufus are the subject of his latest book, "Another Autumn: The Rufus Chronicle," which will be published in May by Ballantine Books.

After he spoke and took questions from the audience, he visited with people and signed their books.

Gusewelle's talk served as a break from a turkey hunt, the failure of which was the subject of his latest Star column. He said after his talk that his hunting party got some birds since then, but he doesn't write about his successes.

"Actually, the bird is the least important part of the hunt," he said. "It's all the rest — companionship, the hour of the day, the sound in the woods, the excitement of working the birds, or in quail hunting, watching the dog work. Pulling the trigger is the least part of it. It's the natural end to a hunt, but every reader can connect with all those other things."

Gusewelle said he has had good experiences hunting in and around Manhattan.

"When Rufus was 11, and his pups were 6 months old — his pups were Pete and Bear, I kept two of the 10 — we hunted up around Greenleaf, which is north of Manhattan, and Rufus pointed a covey of birds in a fence row, and it was the first point that his pups had seen, and at 6 months they honored the point. These two little pups, little squirts, and it was just such a wonderful feeling.

"We found a lot of birds that day. They were flushing out of milo fields, through hedgerows, out into native pasture that had been hayed, and it was just perfect hunting, and point after point, and that one day was the making of those little pups."

Gusewelle said he writes three columns a week, which doesn't give him much time to linger over what he wrote.

"That's part of the joy, because if you write a stinker, in two days you have a chance to recover," he said.

He said he hasn't written too many stinkers, at least not in his editors' eyes.

"I've written 3,380 columns. The editors of the newspaper have killed, in these 19 years, three columns. My wife has probably killed 100," he said. "She's a tough editor. My best editor."

Gusewelle said he liked the new library.

"I think it's spectacular. I think it's a wonderful facility. Of course, I think Manhattan's a great town."

He said he was pleased to be invited to Manhattan to talk about his work. He said he does about 50 talks a year for any group that asks him to speak.

"Writing's a very lonely business, and it's a very satisfying thing to get out and meet the people that read your work," he said.

"A journalist only has so many stories to tell, and I just try to tell my best ones."

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

PART OF THE 22,144-FOOT EXPANSION ADDED TO THE MANHATTAN PUBLIC LIBRARY IS A 24-FOOT-WIDE, THREE-STORY ATRIUM THAT CONNECTS THE NEW ADDITIONS TO THE OLDER PART OF THE BUILDING.

Public library expansion completed

The Manhattan Library Association met on Tuesday at the Manhattan Public Library night for its annual business meeting, one week after the building reopened to the public. The library had been closed for a month to complete the final stages of a $3.7 million, 22,144-foot expansion.

The past year was reviewed, budget was discussed and positions were elected, but most of the excitement was reserved for the library itself.

"This is a really beautiful building that works," Library Director Fred Atchison said. "The things that people liked about the original structure, which were especially a feeling of openness, the high ceilings, light — those things were carried over into the expansion."

The main entrance is a 24-foot-wide, three-story atrium that attaches the old part of the library to the new. The large windows on either side of the atrium allow people to orient themselves in the building, Atchison

Vasiljevic suspended from team

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State coach Tom Asbury has suspended Pero Vasiljevic from the Wildcat basketball squad after being arrested for suspicion of possession of marijuana, drug paraphernalia and obstruction of the legal process.

VASILJEVIC

Kent Brown, K-State Sports Information director, said, "The coach has suspended him indefinitely. This has come on top of previous suspensions."

Vasiljevic, a freshman from Australia, was already on academic suspension and was charged 11 months ago with misdemeanor criminal trespassing and assault, though the charges were lat- dropped later.

Asbury said the severity and duration of the suspension will not be released.

Vasiljevic is scheduled to be arraigned in Riley County District Court this Friday.

The decision came after he was arrested early Tuesday morning at an off-campus residence.

The Riley County Police Department received a phone call from Vasiljevic at 2:45 a.m., when Vasiljevic said someone was trying to break into the residence.

About an hour after they left, they received another call from Vasiljevic asking them to search the residence.

When officers began a search, they found a pipe containing what later was confirmed to be marijuana residue.

Capt. Allen Raynor of the RCPD told The Associated Press that Vasiljevic appeared to be a little disoriented and irrational, and he claimed ownership of the pipe.

Renovations could take until 2000

Renovation of the K-State Student Union will start at the end of May or the first part of June, and there is a critical pathway that has to be followed to reach the estimated finishing time of spring 2000.

"We are not able to accommodate all the things we know are desirous for our operation. We have a financial restriction," said Bernard Pitts, director of the Union. "The biggest thing is to make it through the next 24 months with our $11.5 million renovation."

Making infrastructure improvements will compose 52 percent of the renovation budget.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said several infrastructure

Southeast Kansas teen-ager convicted of murder, to be sentenced on May 26

INDEPENDENCE, Kan. — A teen-ager charged with killing another man last fall has been convicted of second-degree murder.

Jurors returned the verdict Tuesday against Keayon Hadley, 19, in Montgomery County District Court. He will be sentenced May 26 by State District Judge Jack Lively.

Hadley still faces a possible life sentence, but not the "hard 40" that County Attorney Robert Claus sought for a first-degree murder conviction.

Hadley was convicted of killing Brian Durnil, 19, who had moved to Independence from Phoenix before his death.

Claus alleged that Hadley wanted to steal a .357 Magnum gun from Durnil, and that during a target-shooting session in a wooded area Hadley shot him multiple times, then beat him with a baseball bat.

Judge denies immunity for Lewinsky; attorney said he wasn't notified of ruling

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A federal judge has ruled that former White House intern Monica Lewinsky does not have immunity from prosecution in the investigation into whether President Clinton had a sexual relationship with her and sought to cover it up, TV networks reported Wednesday.

The ruling was under seal, CBS and ABC said in their nightly news shows. Lewinsky's attorney, William Ginsburg, told CBS he was not aware of the ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Norma Holloway Johnson. The office of her other attorney, Nathan Speights, said it also had not be notified of the decision.

Ginsburg had gone to court trying to enforce what he has said was a deal in late January with Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr in which his client would be given immunity for her testimony.

Starr's investigation on the Lewinsky matter had slowed in recent weeks as the judge weighed several issues, including a dispute between the prosecutors and attorneys for Clinton aides who have refused to answer grand jury questions, claiming executive privilege.

Del City manager gets fired for forging his resume, says computer made mistake

DEL CITY, Okla. — City council members have fired City Manager Robert Palmateer after confirming with the University of Kansas that he didn't graduate from the university.

Palmateer's resume said he received a bachelor's and a master's degree from the school.

The university said in a letter signed by the school's associate registrar that Palmateer received 17 hours of academic credit but did not graduate.

Palmateer maintained he graduated, and said his records might have been the victim of a computer mix-up. He said he would continue his inquiry into why records contradict his claims.

The city council fired Palmateer after a special meeting Tuesday night. The dismissal was effective immediately. Police Chief Mark Edwards was named acting city manager.

The city council had requested Palmateer's education credentials after published reports said he did not earn the degrees he claimed.

Palmateer was hired as the city's economic development director in 1996 and promoted to city manager last year.

New principals' licensing test unveiled; high standards reflect real-life situations

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A licensing test for would-be principals can measure their ability to handle budgets, discipline, safety and other real-world matters, said developers and advocates who unveiled the examination Wednesday.

Already, four states have adopted the School Leaders Licensure Assessment, developed by the Educational Testing Service of Princeton, N.J., for use this fall. Five states and the District of Columbia financed development of the six-hour, standardized examination.

Most states do not require licensing tests for new principals, although prospective teachers in 35 states must take a nationally standardized test before they are hired or begin studying education. Nationally, 5,000 new principals are licensed each year by states.

The principals' test was created using standards developed by a consortium of states and national education groups organized by the Council of Chief State School Officers, which represents state heads of elementary and secondary schooling.

"Our nation is preparing students by establishing rigorous standards for student learning in many subject areas and raising requirements for those who enter teaching and administration," said Gordon Ambach, executive director of the council. "Today we are adding a new, challenging assessment for school leaders."

The examination has three two-hour sections. Candidates say how they would act in situations that a principal commonly would encounter, then must justify their actions. They also analyze documents such as budgets and staff evaluations and answer questions about those documents.

Gore travels to Middle East to restore peace between Israelites, Palestinians

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With only limited hope of persuading Israel and the Palestinians to resume stalled peace negotiations, Vice President Al Gore went Wednesday to the Middle East to attend Israel's 50th birthday celebrations and to have talks with Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

Gore also is to meet with leaders in Saudi Arabia and Egypt this weekend.

The timing of Gore's trip is important because it comes on the eve of talks in London brokered by the United States and Britain. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and British officials will have separate meetings with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, but a direct Netanyahu-Arafat meeting was not planned.

In a hopeful sign, Arafat accepted a U.S. proposal Wednesday that Israel withdraw in stages from 13 percent of the West Bank's disputed land, with each stage of the pullback being matched by increased Palestinian security against anti-Israel violence. Israeli officials have said Netanyahu will offer no more than 11 percent.

The dispute about how much more land Israel will yield has produced a standoff on the West Bank. Arafat said he would press ahead with a declaration of Palestinian statehood if a peace settlement is not negotiated by May 4, 1999, the deadline set in framework agreements signed in Oslo, Norway.

In Washington, Palestinian spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi told reporters Wednesday she sees little chance that Israel will live up to its side of a West Bank pullback deal even if one were worked out in London.

"Even if Netanyahu finds it within himself to recognize that 1 or 2 or 3 percent is not the linchpin of Israeli security," she said, "we are confident that there will be all sorts of conditionality clauses and phrases that would provide Israel with the proper justification or rationalization for noncompliance."

Wrap-up session to end with appropriations bill

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Senate passage of the final funding bill was the only action as the Legislature launched its wrap-up session Wednesday, while aftershocks reverberated through the Capitol from Gov. Bill Graves' signing of an abortion restriction bill.

Senate passage of the $23 million omnibus appropriations bill, 33-7, sent that measure to the House for debate today. It undoubtedly will then go to a conference committee on Friday to resolve differences. The House version is $40 million bigger than the Senate bill.

The wrap-up session is scheduled to end on Saturday.

Only the omnibus is considered a "must pass" item for the wrap-up, but there is strong pressure to pass some kind of cost-of-living increase for retirees under the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System.

Graves' putting his signature to a bill that greatly restricts late-term abortions in Kansas continued to command attention at the Statehouse.

Graves summoned about two dozen Republican allies in the Legislature to his office, trying to ease their disappointment — and in some cases anger — over his signing of a bill that most of them opposed.

Those who attended said they came away convinced the governor did not sign the bill for political gain, but they also said he didn't necessarily put to rest their concerns about the potential effect of the bill.

The new law, which takes effect July 1, bans most late-term abortions of viable fetuses, including those with severe abnormalities. It removes from current law "severe or life-threatening deformity or abnormality" as an exception to permit late-term abortions.

"I think he felt like he needed to explain his decision to us and answer our questions and concerns," Sen. Pat Ranson, R-Wichita, said. Ranson is one of the Senate's strongest abortion rights advocates. "It was a very frank meeting. Most of those there were pretty disappointed with him."

It also came to light that some pro-life lawmakers disagree on whether the new law allows a mental-health exception for permitting the procedure.

The bill's chief handlers said it includes a narrow exception for mental health, as did Graves in his message to House members after signing the bill on Monday.

But Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, disagreed, insisting a U.S. Supreme Court ruling and other court rulings support his position.

"The governor is wrong. It clearly doesn't include mental health." Kline said.

The House Appropriations Committee amended Graves' proposed cost-of-living increase for state retirees into a bill raising state employees' salaries, hoping to force a vote on the COLA issue in the Senate.

The governor's plan to provide all retirees under the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System with a 3 percent COLA on July 1 was attached to the annual pay bill that already has passed the Senate.

That bill would provide 4 percent pay raises for all state employees, legislators and elected officials. Legislators' daily salaries during the session would go to $72.06 from $69.29. The bill would cost the state nearly $54 million.

It will take just 21 votes in the 40-member Senate to agree with the House version of the bill and send the pay and pension increases to Graves — bypassing a KPERS conference committee led by Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, who opposes that much of a cost-of-living increase for pensioners.

"This action gives more strength to a KPERS COLA getting passed in the Senate, because it can just concur," said Rep. Mike Farmer, R-Wichita, who proposed the amendment. It was adopted on a nearly unanimous voice vote by the House committee.

Republicans kept the Senate from adding extra money for special education programs and aid to local governments to the omnibus budget bill.

Democrats wanted to add amendments that would have more than doubled its cost. Their proposals came with a price tag of nearly $28 million.

The Senate added only $1.45 million in spending — $1.4 million for community programs for the mentally retarded and $50,000 for university scholarships for minority students.

Most Republicans rejected a Democratic proposal to increase spending on special education programs in public elementary, junior high and high schools by nearly $11.3 million.

They also blocked proposals to increase state aid to cities and counties by as much as $10.2 million.

Mims misses arraignment date; no charges pressed

JAKE PALENSKE
Kansas State Collegian

Carl William Mims, Overland Park, Kan., did not appear as scheduled for his arraignment Wednesday morning in Riley County District Court.

Mims was arrested on the night of April 22 as a suspect in the stabbing of Fort Riley Army Specialist Brian R. Rodrigues.

The altercation started inside Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon when Mims allegedly assaulted Blanca Alcantar, Santa Maria, Calif.

Alcantar was at the bar with Rodrigues. Mims allegedly hit Alcantar and threw beer on her. Rodrigues and three to six other witnesses pursued Mims and caught up to him in front of Espresso Royale Caffe, where the stabbing occurred.

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said that as of now, no charges have been filed against Mims. Kennedy said that until his office receives more verifiable facts, he does not feel confident filing charges. Another arraignment date will be set for Mims.

No information on the condition of Rodrigues is available, as his wife has requested that no information be released to the news media.

Rodrigues still is hospitalized at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue.

Library expansion to improve references, research

The $3.7 million and 22,144-foot expansion of the Manhattan Public Library merely improves an already reliable resource for information and entertainment in this community.

The renovations offer more room to house acquisitions.

A smart use of the additional space and a reorganization of the collection to make access more coherent means users will be able to find information more effectively.

The library, at Poyntz and Julliette avenues, is nearly twice the size as before.

Although the facility primarily functions as a city library and offers variety, it serves as a great resource for students.

Checking out the new building is an opportunity to get off campus and explore another venue for books, newspapers and journals.

Students with children and education majors might be interested in the library's collection of children's books and young adult novels — works that would be out of place at Hale Library.

There are also new or recent fiction and nonfiction available, in addition to books on audio.

Library Director Fred Atchison should be congratulated and thanked for the completion of this project, and the 60-person staff also should be commended for its efforts of cleaning and moving books and bookshelves.

An upgrade to the computers will place the library catalog online by the end of May. There is also free Internet access so students and members of the community can surf the World Wide Web for information and do research.

There are also several physical enhancements to the inside of the building, including refurbishments, such as new carpet and furniture.

If it's been a while since you've read something other than a textbook, this is a chance to find a bestseller or some older treasure to read.

The upcoming finals week brings a lot of foot traffic to Hale Library, and studying at the newly renovated Manhattan Public Library offers a less-crowded change of pace.

Volunteer work rewards itself

Community service should continue throughout year

A remarkable change of pace. Many of us are begging for exactly that at this time of year.

As finals week draws near and hints of summer waft along in the breeze every afternoon around 3 p.m., who couldn't appreciate the opportunity to get involved with something different, and (dare I say it) something that might be a little bit of fun? I'm not talking about throwing a 72-hour Spam and Beer Festival with a few of your friends, nor am I suggesting the Union Program Council sponsor a "Raddest Leg Warmers Contest" as the final leg of its '80s nostalgia month.

> "So if volunteering is its own reward, why don't more K-State students get involved when the opportunity arises?"

Instead, I'm talking about volunteering in the community. Find someone who needs something done, or a group that has a problem it can't solve by itself, and contribute whatever skills and energy you can. With National Community Service Week just last week, one might easily tune out this message.

"I mean, c'mon already, everyone knows that was last week. This week is the week before dead week — like, y'know, the week before the week before finals. Everyone has a lot of work to do, so they can finish all their projects on time, and then deal with finals."

True enough. But how many people actually took part in the volunteer events that the KSU Community Service Program had organized? Far too few. The beneficiaries of the activities organized through the Community Service Program's efforts certainly will never complain about the services that were donated, but the numbers beg the question of whether we K-Staters can't do better.

In fact, directors of the KSU Community Service Program said far fewer than 100 K-State students got involved last week. And that number only represents the total number of bodies that were recorded as having attended each day, it doesn't take into account students who might have volunteered several different times during the week. Besides, even if 100 students had participated, that still would represent fewer than one out of every 200 students on campus.

Look up right now. If you are walking across campus, sitting in the K-State Student Union, or roaming through Hale Library, you should be able to get an idea of what a gaggle of 200 people looks like. Hold that thought. Now pick a person, any person, and blank them out of your mind. Now look again. These are the people who didn't take part.

One last thought before you move on: imagine how much work could be accomplished in just two hours by the work force of 199 people you see before you. That's an enormous pool of untapped potential.

For those who took part last week, regardless of your motivation or the total amount of time and labor you donated, I offer my commendation. For some, my feelings of appreciation might be about as valuable as a mound of belly-button lint, but that's all right; I offer it all the same.

The lack of tangible value associated with my commendation should be meaningless. Community service doesn't need to involve some sort of external reward. One would be extremely hard-pressed to find people who have participated in a bona fide volunteer service event and would speak negatively about their experiences.

Even for the most cynical naysayer, making a sacrifice for the community in which one is immersed tends to yield a positive feeling, especially if the overwhelming majority of participants simply felt like contributing something back to the fabric of their community (and weren't politicians looking for photo-ops).

So if volunteering is its own reward, why don't more K-State students get involved when the opportunity arises? Admittedly, Community Service Week might have coincided with an exam-laden week that prevented most students from participating. Further, quite a few students already are involved in organizations that occasionally perform some voluntary service activities. But would anyone hope to explain the low number of participants with such weak explanations? I hope not, because neither rationalization probably has much to do with the situation.

In many ways, the university experience limits the amount of time one might be able to contribute to such ventures. Keeping up with exams, homework and projects is more than a full-time job. Moreover, many students are forced to find gainful employment on the side to help make ends meet.

But again, I have to wonder: fewer than one out of every 200 students?

If being a university student is what's preventing the majority of students from volunteering in the community, then it's our system of education that is in dire need of a change of pace.

In world with racial competition, majority just doesn't play fairly

We are well into the game. We have been playing it for so long and it seems like it's never going to end. For a lot of us, it's a game we did not even want to play. It was a game forced upon a large majority by a dominant minority. To most people, the playing field is thought to be equal and the game is thought to be, as now seen, "fair." Time has created a blindness — what happened at the beginning of the game is no longer seen as relevant.

Throughout the game, one side played by cheating, stealing, bribing and every other evil deed one can imagine. The other team never had a chance, because it never was meant for them to win in the first place.

The injustices of the winning team finally are noticed by a few, so to make the game a little more equal, the winning team bends the rules just enough to satisfy the losing team. However, that does not equalize the game completely. It just gives up just enough so the losing team will stay in the game, but not quit. The game is well into its ending, and no one ever took notice of what happened at the beginning. I am curious as to what the score at the end will be or could have been had the playing field always been fair.

This is an idea I studied in the book "Race and Women's Lives." I thought it was a great analogy to answer everyone's questions about my columns and the responses that have been sent into the Collegian.

First of all, this is actually my first column even touching on the "race issue" that a few of the Collegian readers have suggested is my only subject. My columns have dealt with education, the ghettos, grieving, giving back to the community, education by experiences, crime and punishment, and now this issue. I write about what I know, my life experiences.

I am not angry because of people's different opinions, nor am I angry when someone does not agree with what I say. At first, the responses seemed to surprise me because I did not know all I did was complain, as some readers suggested to me.

However, after re-reading all my columns, I assumed they missed a few or read only a few and even then, read what they wanted to read and not what I wrote. I am not angry because someone else's life experiences are different than mine. That is what I saw when I read all the negative and positive responses.

Race does matter, and if you ever thought it didn't, you live in an isolated world. Anytime one is in a lecture class and the issue of race comes up, the reflex is to look at everyone in the class, including the instructors and professors, and automatically find the only black or brown face in the room.

That person is asked his or her opinion, to lead the dialogue and answer the questions that so many people are afraid to ask. What happened in the past does matter and does have an effect. If it did not, then we would not be talking about these issues now.

White supremacy is a ruling factor. White supremacy does not mean every Caucasian person is superior or Caucasian people are all racist. Like I mentioned in a previous column, racism is not limited just to be perpetrated by one race. White supremacy simply means when the game was being played first, whites ruled supreme and it is the cause of all the inequality that still exists. No, no one is to be blamed for what happened in the past, but no one should deny what the past has brought us. Things have changed, and we as people have made strides forward.

But to deny that no one struggles because of oppression or to hide behind sayings such as, "My grandfathers and forefathers may have owned slaves, but I don't," is a slap in the face to everyone who struggles today because of the racism that still exists.

Along the lines of denying racism exists, I find it offensive when people try to convince themselves and other individuals they are far from being a racist because they have acquaintances who are of a different race. Merely pointing out that you have close friends or a best friend who is a certain ethnicity brings me to the question, "If race really did not matter, why do you point it out when you say my so-and-so ethnic friend?"

In conclusion, the game for me seems like it is never going to end. It is when I least expect it that I find myself sometimes moving backward instead of forward. Hopefully this semester, however, I have touched the lives of a lot of students and will allow them time to stop and think what it would be like if they were not Caucasian, African-American, Latino or Asian. The game would go on, and I do believe all the injustices could then be better understood.

Reader says tryouts shouldn't be criticized

Editor,

This is in response to a letter to the editor from Danielle Mitchell on Wednesday. We are both former Classy Cats members, but because of school changes and time commitments are not members this coming season. We want to clear up some of the "allegations" so that you and others with concerns might learn the truth.

First of all, there are many different styles of dancing. We know the majority of K-State only sees the Classy Cats doing sideline cheer-style moves, but it does not mean that is all we do. Jazz routines include pirouettes and axel turns.

In fact, they have ever since dance was first developed and will always continue to.

Just because they aren't done in high school doesn't mean they don't exist in jazz dancing.

Like we said, many people don't see the Classy Cats actually dance. However, last April the team took a routine to nationals in Daytona Beach, Fla., which included a variety of movements including pirouettes and axels.

You said you were angered that more than half of the 36 finalists were former Classy Cats members.

We know for a fact that those former members have had extensive dance training (besides high school drill teams) and are also familiar with the skills needed for this particular dance team.

We both witnessed tryouts and found that the women who had been on the team before or had previous training did much better than those who did not make cuts.

Besides, no one dragged anyone out of bed and made them try out. Everyone trying out was there by choice, including the past members.

Just because some women had been on the team before does not mean they cannot try out again. Nor does it mean they will make it again. In fact, there were many women who did not make the team again this year.

Another point we would like to make is the fact that K-State Classy Cats dance team is an equal-opportunity dance squad. You are not judged on your race or ethnic background, but rather on your dance ability, skills and performance. Just because an African-American former Classy Cat did not make the team does not mean she was weeded out because of the color of her skin.

As for the Classy Cats knowing the tryout routine before Saturday, did you attend the Vanilla Ice concert last Thursday night at the Wareham Opera House?

If you had, you would have noticed that the routines being practiced at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, by former Classy Cats members, were the routines being performed at the concert, not at tryouts. In fact, the tryout dance had never been performed by Classy Cats in previous years, nor did any of the returnees know a single part of it.

In response to your feelings about the coach being present at tryouts, if you would have listened in the beginning of tryouts, Frank Tracz mentioned that they had not even picked a coach yet for the upcoming year.

Besides, if supposedly a coach is picking the team, then why would there be any judges in the first place? So to ease your concerns, there was not a coach involved in any way, shape or form.

In closing, we too are paying our money to K-State and feel we were judged fairly when we auditioned in previous years.

We hope we have cleared up some of your concerns. Maybe in the future you will learn before jumping to conclusions about why you did not succeed at certain things to think before blaming the system.

K-State should take action against DUIs

Editor,

K-State is in need of a late-night transportation system. After looking at the Collegian daily and seeing the reports of DUIs and transportation of open container reports, I think we need something that allows students to call after going to a party or to the bars and get a safe ride home at night. According to the Student Life Handbook, in 1993 there were 26,563 students and two were arrested for transporting an open container.

In 1994, student population decreased to 24,055 and the number of arrests for transporting an open container rose to 13. The final statistic given was for 1996, when the student population was 24,824 and there was a one-person increase in the number of people arrested for the same crime. This is merely the number arrested, not convicted or charged.

We need to take notice of the problem of DUI and the dangers it entails.

I urge the administration and namely the Student Governing Association to take note of this need and implement a system that will support our student needs. I feel the financial burden would not be harsh, and I would be willing to bet local businesses in Aggieville would kick in a few dollars to support something that will eventually increase their business.

Organizations should establish own rules

Editor,

I have been reading the ongoing debate in the Collegian about gays in the Boy Scouts of America and have come to the conclusion that both sides of this issue are using inflammatory language and bigotry to create a huge controversy about a simple issue.

The simple issue at stake here: Can a voluntary organization set its own rules and standards for membership?

There are all kinds of voluntary organizations in this country. All of these organizations have different rules, membership criteria and goals. Their membership criteria and rules reflect the path the organization takes to achieve these goals. Should the government be able to step in and tell the Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society, the Scouts or any organization how to govern itself? The answer is no.

People join the Boy Scouts because of what the Scouts stand for. I was in Cub Scouts and Webelos for these reasons.

Instead of changing the Boy Scouts to meet the agenda of a small group of scouts, these gay scouts and leaders should form their own organization. They have the right to do so and would be able to set the rules and goals as they see fit.

Please do not do to others what you do not want done to yourself. Do not tell me to believe what you believe is right, and try to force the government to infringe upon my rights by forcing me to accept what you believe. Please look at the facts and put aside bitterness and hatred on both sides.

I am a Christian, and I do not believe that homosexuality is God's plan or desire for people. I do not hate homosexuals.

I believe they have the right to believe as they choose. God gave every person the right to free will. I will never infringe upon that right. It is not a right to be able to join the Boy Scouts; it is a privilege.

The Boy Scouts is not telling gay people to believe differently than they do.

The Boy Scouts does not agree with gay people's beliefs and chooses not to admit them into membership, as is its right.

Reader says Collegian should inform sooner

Editor,

I love my Collegian. However, the articles that always catch my eye never seem to give you complete information. Dates and times often seem to be omitted. Additionally, learning of a current event doesn't do me any good if the knowledge comes to me the day of the event or day after the event has occurred.

For instance, in the Tuesday Collegian, an article relating to an auctioning off of students for an AIDS benefit was printed.

The article states the time and place the auction was to occur, but learning of the event the morning it occurs does not allow time for much planning. What if I had wished to donate my time to be an available bachelor? The Collegian is often my only source of campus news and events.

As I stated before, I love being able to read the Collegian in the morning. However, please try to inform people a little sooner and always contain the most basic of journalism facts.

Students not priority of Parking Services

Editor,

It's incredible how much of an overwhelmingly negative response you receive when you mention "Parking Services" to students here at K-State. After paying $60 for a parking permit each year, you'd expect to have a parking space available to you when you get to campus. Instead, you are forced to become a predator and fight numerous other students for the few available. Parking in metered spaces at the K-State Student Union really isn't much different, either. Again, after a long challenge you finally find a spot and then return to your car after class only to find a ticket. Experiences such as these are common among students. It's time Parking Services actually provides a service and upholds its mission statement.

Parking Services, I'm sure, would adamantly defend its position and provide examples of services it provides, such as helping change a flat tire or taking students to get a gallon of gas. However, these services don't amount to much. One big reason is Parking Services makes no real effort to inform students of these services. The second is these services haven't been designed with the student in mind. For example, the shuttle bus has an odd schedule that doesn't really mesh well with students and their destinations.

Understanding that Parking Services has a job to do is a responsibility of the student. However, providing services to benefit the student body and faculty is the responsibility of Parking Services. If we all understand our responsibilities, a step in the right direction might be obtained here at K-State.

Union worker upset with editorial board

Editor,

On Monday we had a bomb threat at the K-State Student Union. The editorial staff of the Collegian said it believed the evacuation was handled poorly. As an employee who was asked to help with the evacuation, I can tell you firsthand that the students did not care that we were concerned for their safety. When they were told to leave the front of the building and move across the street, they were angry that we inconvenienced them and sent them out into the rain. One young man accused the Union of "holding another one of your phony bomb threats just to inconvenience me."

I take my safety and that of everyone who enters the Union quite seriously, as does every employee here. I agree that barriers and more personnel would have made the situation safer, but the K-State Police have limited personnel resources and with two buildings to check, they were spread thin. Union employees were not standing close to the building to protect themselves from the weather; we literally were blocking the entrances from students who had bypassed other employees stationed farther out in the area. Many students even ignored uniformed officers in their pursuit of the Union doors.

You know the old '60s catch phrase, "If you're not a part of the solution, you're part of the problem." Well, I'll go one better — if you have a problem, get up off your backside and do something about it. I'm afraid this doesn't include throwing words and condemnations at it. If the members of the editorial board of the Collegian sincerely believe things could have been handled better, I invite them to write a contingency plan for the next bomb threat and submit it to the Union Governing Board and the campus police. Do something constructive.

Be a part of the solution, instead of a part of the problem.

Mann's plan ignores majority of students

Editor,

Much attention has been given as of late to Student Body President Tracey Mann and Vice President Andy Macklin's plans to increase diversity on campus.

I am confident that these two are capable leaders who will implement positive changes at K-State.

However, as representatives of this student body, it is incumbent upon us not to lose sight of the majority's needs and desires. Though, in doing so, we certainly cannot afford to ignore the rights of the minority.

It deeply concerns me that we are focusing so heavily on opening the channels of communication with a few select groups on campus who do not compose a large percentage of the student body. As representatives, this goes against what we should be supporting.

True, minority groups might not have been acknowledged in the past by our student government. But then, neither have the majority groups. How can minority groups cry "discrimination" when the majority has been ignored in the same manner?

I strongly support the right of students to have a voice in their government.

My door is always open — be you a white male or an Asian female. That, my friend, is true diversity.

Rematch in works for Bailey, Johnson at Goodwill Games

NEW YORK — The ballyhooed match race between Michael Johnson and Donovan Bailey, which proved a bust last year, could take place again this summer as part of the Goodwill Games in New York.

Harvey Schiller, president of Turner Sports, which will televise the Goodwill Games, said there was a "good possibility" of a rematch of the 150-meter showdown at Toronto, where Johnson pulled up injured after 70 meters.

Schiller said that while there are many details to be arranged, the race could be set in a few weeks.

"Both are competitive people, and they like the excitement of it," Schiller said.

"I don't think there's a downside. Both are running very fast."

Johnson is the 1996 Olympic 200-meter and 400-meter champion and 200 world-record holder. Bailey is the 1996 100 gold medalist and world-record holder.

The track and field portion of the Goodwill Games will be held July 19-22 in Long Island, with Johnson trying to duplicate his Olympic double in the 200 and 400 and Bailey running in the 100. Schiller said the rematch probably would be held near the Aug. 2 end of the games.

Brad Hunt, Johnson's agent, and Ray Flynn, Johnson's agent, said they are enthusiastic about the rematch, with the logical distance again 150 meters.

Hunt, however, said Johnson would not consider a two-man race nor a race on a temporary track.

"If they want to put on a race, he would have to have the best guys in the world, about four or five, or even fill the (eight) lanes," Hunt said.

"How can you have a race without Ato Boldon, Maurice Greene or Frankie Fredericks? If they want a race at this point in time that has meaning, you have to include those guys. If it's two men, it's two men other than Michael Johnson."

Tyson, Rooney to battle again in New York Court of Appeals

ALBANY, N.Y. — The Court of Appeals again finds itself in the middle of the legal battle between Mike Tyson and his former trainer.

The U.S. Court of Appeals, based in New York City, is considering whether to reinstate a $4.4 million award made to Kevin Rooney by a federal court jury in Albany in September 1996.

The federal court asked the judges on the state's highest court to render an interpretation about New York state law that would help the federal court decide the Rooney-Tyson matter.

The state Court of Appeals will hear arguments on Tuesday.

Rooney's award was thrown out early last year by the judge who presided over the trial, Thomas McAvoy.

The judge said the jury could not legally come back with a verdict in Rooney's favor.

McAvoy's problem — and the one the U.S. Court of Appeals also appears to be grappling with — is the legal standing in New York of the oral assurance that the former heavyweight champion gave Rooney that he would train the boxer for as long as Tyson fought.

McAvoy ruled that statement meant the two had nothing more than an "at-will" contract, meaning that under New York law either man could terminate it at any time.

Tyson said he never had a written contract with Rooney and he had the power to fire him, as he did in 1988.

The court's determination will be used by the U.S. Court of Appeals to decide whether to reinstate the verdict against Tyson. McAvoy also ruled last February that his charge to the jury last year was faulty and that Tyson deserves a new trial, even if the legality of the jury verdict is upheld.

Rooney trained Tyson starting as a teen under the legendary trainer Cus D'Amato, who died in 1985.

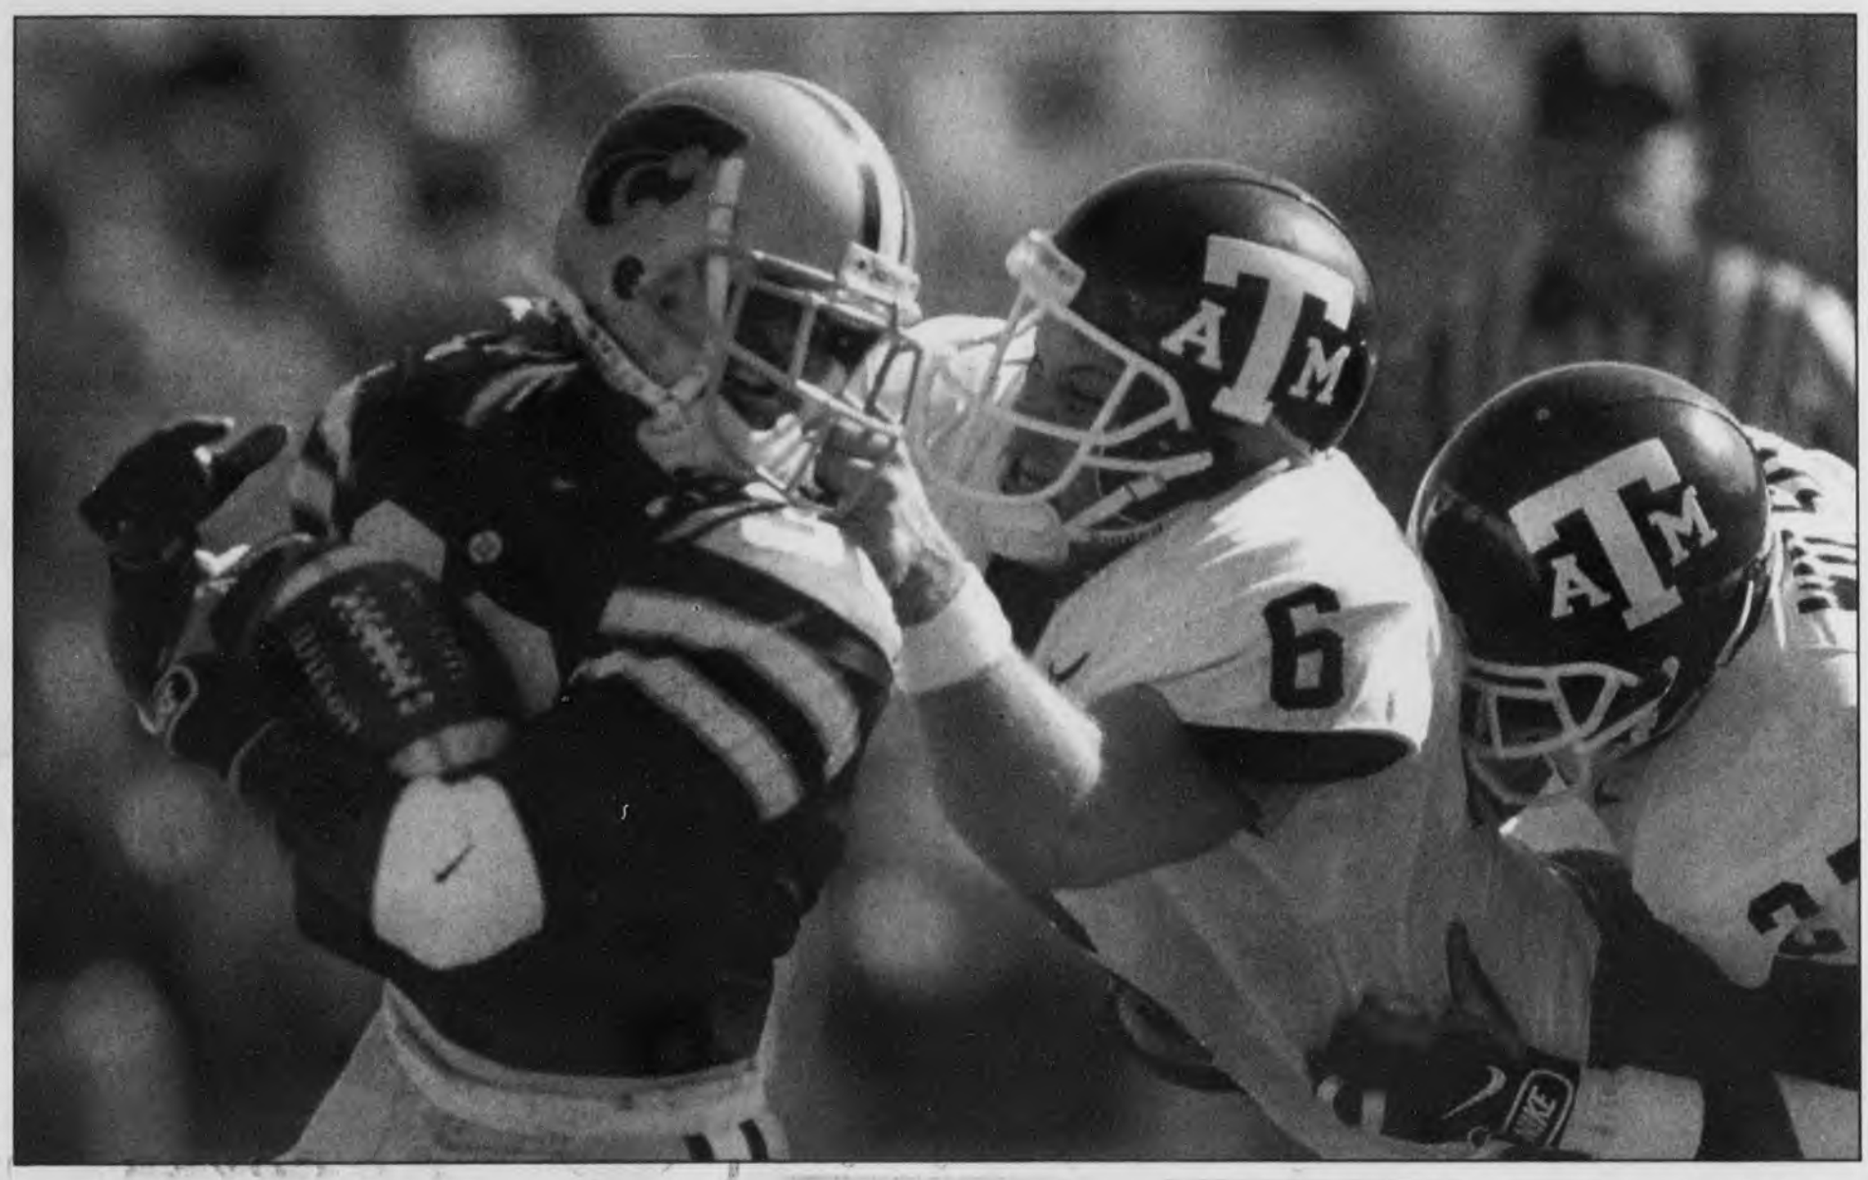
Rooney was dismissed after promoter Don King began to direct Tyson's affairs in the late 1980s.

Western Resources assures Royals fans fair utility rates

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A joint effort by Western Resources Inc., a regional utility, and Kansas City Chiefs owner Lamar Hunt to buy the Kansas City Royals has some wondering if the utilitiy's customers will be affected if the deal goes through.

Not a chance, says Western Resources chairman and chief executive John E. Hayes Jr., who says no utility customers would be affected even if, say, Dean Palmer hits 50 home runs in a year and signs a megabucks contract with the team.

Westar Capital, the company that would co-own the Royals with Hunt, is a subsidiary separate from Western's utilities, Hayes said.



He also said Westar has a separate financial system.

However, Western's shareholders — who would share any ownership stake in the baseball team — might fare differently.

"They will realize the losses, yes," Hayes said.

SPRING FOOTBALL FEVER

Expectations mounting for Bishop, Snyder in '98

BYRON VOGEL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State fans couldn't be hungrier as they await their first taste of Wildcat football since the Fiesta Bowl last December.

With 18 returning starters from last year's 11-1 team, expectations have never been higher. However, K-State coach Bill Snyder is approaching Saturday's spring game as just another practice.

Game info
The spring game is at 1:10 p.m. Saturday at KSU Stadium. Tickets are $2 for students, $3 for the general public.

"It is not showcasing individuals or showcasing an offense or a defense," Snyder said. "It is showcasing individual fundamentals and an ability to execute techniques.

"Some are a little more highly motivated in this arena than they might be in a practice environment. If youngsters step up and perform better during the spring game it tells me what he can do, and therefore the expectation level rises considerably."

At a press conference Tuesday Snyder said he had not decided how he would divide the team for the purple-white clash, although in the past he typically has sent his starters up against reserves.

"We won't decide until maybe Thursday whether we will go good against good, best against best or ones against twos," Snyder said.

He said the spring game, which begins at 1:10 p.m., will follow a full-game format with punting and kickoffs.

Quarterbacks will face contact, but precautions will be made to guard against injury.

While all eyes might fall on running back Frank Murphy, Snyder said the community-college transfer will back up senior Eric Hickson. Snyder also said spring practices have given him an opportunity to evaluate Murphy more.

"I've learned he's very human," Snyder said. "Being however fast you happen to be isn't the answer to all the issues and problems at a position you might play. I've also learned he's very competitive, he's a very fine player and he has a lot of abilities, but he doesn't have the big 'S' on his chest or anything like what seems to be indicated."

SNYDER

Faced with the prospect of having to tackle one or both running backs, strong safety Jarrod Cooper said he'll keep the same philosophy he uses in practice.

"I don't think about who it is I'm tackling. I just go out and do it," Cooper said. "I just try not to get run over."

After dedicating the winter to improving his strength and conditioning, Hickson said he is more confident than ever after a broken leg he suffered two years ago. He also emphasized the team's preparation for the season, and he said goals for the spring game are clear.

"Basically it's just another practice, and we're not going to treat it any differently," he said. "We just want to be fundamentally sound and not make any dumb mistakes like jumping offsides or other stuff that hurts the team during a game."

Snyder also said his receivers have made some much-needed progress this spring.

"The wide-receiver corps as a group has made vast improvement," Snyder said. "A year ago at this time I wasn't very happy with them. Six months ago I wasn't very happy with them."

Darnell McDonald's three-touchdown performance in the Fiesta Bowl won't soon be forgotten, but the wide receiver said he still felt like he had something to prove Saturday.

"Coach told me he has more confidence in me this year, and he wants me to have a good showing," McDonald said. "I just want to go out and have a good showing and score a couple of times and get the fans on my side."

While Snyder did say quarterback Michael Bishop's game was picking up after a lackluster start this spring, the team's opener in September is still far away.

"We haven't solved all the issues that have been in front of us," Snyder said. "I'm not convinced yet with our offensive line that we have all the pieces to the puzzle together.

"I get a little concerned about offensive execution in the spring, and probably always have been, and this season is no different. But I'm hard-pressed to push it off to, 'It's just that time of year.'"

Kicker Martin Gramatica will not play in the spring game after undergoing surgery to remove scar tissue in his right knee that resulted from his ACL surgery 18 months ago.

Lamar Hunt might just be the answer for Kansas City Royals

Hurray for Lamar Hunt!

Hunt for president!

Hunt for Major League Baseball Commissioner!

Well, maybe not yet. Maybe not ever. But it might not be the worst idea in the world.

Hunt, who has owned the Kansas City Chiefs since their introduction into the American Football League in 1960 as the Dallas Texans, has just stepped up to the plate, folks.

Tuesday, Hunt announced he had put in a "competitive bid" to purchase the Kansas City Royals. And as far as sports franchises are concerned, this man is batting a thousand.

Hunt Sports owns a percentage of the Chicago Bulls as well as two Major League Soccer teams — the Columbus Crew and the Kansas City Wizards.

Now, people aren't turning out in stampedes to watch Wizards games, but this is only the third season of the team's existence. Kansas City hasn't yet blossomed as a soccer city, but Hunt's Wizards have been a legitimate MLS championship contender since their inception.

And when the Chiefs stunk for so many years, did Hunt turn his back on the franchise and sell it to the highest bidder? No. He stuck with it for the long haul, and now it's paying off tenfold.

A month ago, Hunt hadn't dreamed of purchasing the Royals. But when faced with the thought of looking outside his Arrowhead Stadium office window and seeing the "K" all boarded up, he said he had to do whatever it took to make sure the team stayed in Kansas City.

This is a man who cares about more than money, a rare commodity in today's capitalistic society. And he needs that rare commodity when dealing with this baseball team.

Sure, it's a no-profit situation, strapping the current losing team to the pocketbook.

Sure, Hunt is competing with popular bidder and ex-Royal George Brett.

But these are merely curveballs.

Once Hunt puts his finger in the Royals' pie, he will stir things up — for the better.

I see a new general manager for the team in the future and new strategies in marketing the team and signing the players. Hunt will go all out to try to keep the players happy in Kansas City, as well as keeping the fans coming to the ballpark.

George and brother Bobby might get the bid and buy the team and become great owners. But they might not.

With Hunt, there are no question marks.

I imagine there would be a prominent position for Brett within the Hunt/Royals organization. And I'm thinking Brett probably wouldn't turn it down.

Hunt even has teamed up with a highly respectable, Topeka-based regional utility, Western Resources Inc., to make the purchase. So Topekans as well as Kansas Citians will have a vested interest in the venture.

The more, the merrier.

Any bandwagon with Hunt driving would be one worth jumping on.

No, I'm not going to start calling myself a Royals fan all of a sudden.

That would be the wrong kind of bandwagon-jumping. But I am a Kansas City fan, because I grew up there. And I am a baseball fan.

But with Hunt as the Royals' new owner, it would be the best thing for the team as well as the city.

Go forth and purchase, Hunt.

Alumni to open taco bar

MARY BOSCO
Kansas State Collegian

A new, colorful addition will be added to the Aggieville business district May 7 to fill the vacant structure Burrito King left behind. The Pink Taco, a new restaurant and bar, will open at 1101 Moro St.

Former K-State students James Sperman and John Wertin, and Mike Gardner, senior in social science, said they are looking to create a cross between a Taco Bell and Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon's atmosphere.

"We are building my dream in college that I wish we had when I was there," Sperman said. "Cheap beer and cheap Mexican food all the time. A fun place where people can have a good time and start their evenings."

> "I WANT TO HAVE A WHOLE ARMY OF PINK TACOS IN FIVE YEARS ALL OVER THE WORLD."
> MIKE GARDNER
> senior in social science

The three have been in the process of creating the Pink Taco for the past six months.

"It takes a long time," Sperman said. "When we first started, we couldn't imagine why everyone wouldn't want to open their own business because it seemed so easy, but we quickly had to cross many obstacles and hit dead ends along the way."

Together, the three went through the process of getting a loan, putting together a business and marketing plan, and deciding on equipment, design and furniture. They also worked closely with Fred Rice, director of K-State's Small Business Development Center, and hired an interior designer.

"The three are very creative, mature, business minded and they have an awareness of the needs and desires of the students," Rice said. "It is important to have these qualities, and to be successful you have to understand the market."

Wertin said they were looking for a market that was lacking in Aggieville.

"Aggieville doesn't have a cheap Mexican place," Wertin said. "We are very excited, and are happy to have a good location."

Sperman agreed, and said the building will look completely different when students return in the fall.

"It is going to end up looking like a fort with the front entrance facing the Moro side," Sperman said.

The three said they are looking for this to be only the beginning of the Pink Taco. They have visions of creating a franchise across the nation, and that is why they chose the name. Originally, they said they were going to call it the Purple Taco, but felt that would only cater to its K-State location, so they selected pink as a more neutral color.

"I want to have a whole army of Pink Tacos in five years all over the world," Gardner said.

Sperman was more specific in his vision.

"I want to have 1,000 stores in 15 years throughout the country," he said.

Another goal of Sperman's is for it to be known as a "cool" place and not just another bar in Aggieville. After numerous hours of planning and lack of sleep, the three said they are ready for the opening day.

"We are ready to get started and begin working 65 hours a week," Sperman said.

Sperman said Wertin brings experience to the group as the Texas Star Cafe kitchen manager for the past four years, Sperman has leadership and business qualities, and the group looks at Gardner as the glue that binds them together.

"I keep them sane and under control. I have to remind them of reality sometimes and not to think too big," Gardner said.

Art pulled for fear of confiscation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The owners of two Pierre Bonnard paintings have withdrawn them from an exhibit coming to the Museum of Modern Art, citing the New York district attorney's seizure last January of two artworks allegedly looted by the Nazis.

When the district attorney took the action last winter, some experts warned it was a dangerous precedent that would discourage museums from lending works of art.

The withdrawal of the two Bonnards is the first and so far only direct consequence of the seizure, the museum said.

The owner of one of the Bonnard paintings, "Gray Nude in Profile," told the museum the work is being pulled from the exhibit because of concern over the district attorney's action.

The museum would not identify the owner, whose letter — with the author's name left off — was included in court papers filed by the museum in its attempt to fight the district attorney's action.

The unidentified owner of another Bonnard, "Standing Nude," has withdrawn that painting as well for the same reason, according to a museum official speaking on condition of anonymity.

Museum spokeswoman Mary Lou Strahlendorff said Wednesday she doesn't know of any suggestions that the two Bonnards had been plundered by the Nazis. Instead, she said the owners simply are alarmed at the prospect of paintings being detained.

Four months ago, District Attorney Robert Morgenthau obtained a subpoena barring the museum from returning two paintings by Egon Schiele to the Austrian institution that lent them. Two families in New York claim the works were plundered during the Nazi era from now-dead relatives.

Morgenthau blocked the paintings' return to Austria until the matter can be sorted out.

The museum said state law protects borrowed art from seizure. Morgenthau, however, said the law does not protect property in a criminal investigation.

A judge's ruling on the fate of the two Schiele pictures is expected next month.

In February, the directors of a number of leading overseas museums wrote to warn that the district attorney's action will discourage them from lending works of art, Stahlendorff said. The writers included directors of the Louvre, the British Museum, the Israel Museum, Amsterdam's Rijksmuseum and the Hermitage in Russia.

Their letter said the museums have relied on New York and federal laws protecting loaned art from seizure and that their confidence has been shaken.

"European museums urgently require reassurance on this point, if they are to lend again to exhibitions in the United States," the letter said.

The Bonnard retrospective, now on exhibit in London, was organized by the Tate Gallery and consists of 84 works by the turn-of-the-century French painter and printmaker.

When they arrive at the Museum of Modern Art on June 21 for a 16-week exhibit, "Gray Nude in Profile" and "Standing Nude" will not be among them.

Defense Secretary awards Dole medal

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT MYER, Va. — Praising the former Senate majority leader as the definition of heroism and courage for millions of Americans, Defense Secretary William Cohen awarded Bob Dole a public service medal Wednesday.

At an armed forces full-service review, Cohen recognized Dole for his leadership on the battlefield, where he served in the Army, and on Capitol Hill, where he represented his home state of Kansas in both the House and the Senate.

"He has remained a man with fire in his heart," said Cohen, who gave Dole the Defense Department's Distinguished Public Service Medal. Cohen compared Dole to a warrior eager every day to take on a new battle.

The former Republican senator nodded his head in rhythm as the military band performed and watched as soldiers from all divisions of the armed services marched before him.

Dole, who lost his bid for the presidency in 1996, accepted the award with characteristic humor.

"Between receiving an award from a secretary of defense and appointing a secretary of defense, I'd choose the latter," Dole said.

Dole said of all the titles he has accumulated in his career, he is most proud of two that have nothing to do with elected office: Kansan and veteran.

Dole's combat wounds in Italy during World War II cost him the use of his right arm. He received the Purple Heart Medal twice.

Cohen cited Dole for his continued commitment to veterans during his Senate career, such as on a law protecting the rights of the disabled and a missing persons act. Dole responded by lauding American service members for their work and pledging to stand up on issues important to them.

When it comes to national defense, Dole said, "We should not define ourselves as Democrats or Republicans but simply as Americans."

Dole's wife, Elizabeth, and daughter, Robin, also attended the ceremony at the Fort Myer base.

Financial aid helps strapped students

▶UNDERGRADUATES HAVE OPTIONS TO SUPPLEMENT SPENT ACCOUNTS IN TIME FOR SUMMER CLASSES.

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

Undergraduate students will have to look at other financial aid options for the summer if they have used the maximum amount of their William D. Ford Direct Loan or Federal Family Education Loan money for the year.

Director of Student Financial Assistance Larry Moeder said student loans have annual limits on the amount of money a student can receive. Freshmen can borrow up to $2,625, sophomores $3,500, and junior and senior students $5,500.

He said these levels are based on credit hours earned. If students have used all their money for the year, Moeder said there are several options available to them. He said a Federal Pell Grant gives students $400 to $2,700 a year, and it doesn't have to be repaid. Eligibility is determined by the annual Student Aid Report.

"A student is entitled to a certain amount of grant money according to the student's financial need," Moeder said.

A PLUS Loan allows parents to borrow as much as $9,800 minus any other financial aid the student receives. Moeder said this loan has several disadvantages.

"This loan is stricter. It has a high interest rate of 9 percent, and repayment starts 60 days after they get the money," he said.

Moeder said students can borrow an additional $4,000 per year in Direct or FFEL loans if their parent or guardian is denied the PLUS loan by a lender for credit reasons.

The KSU Alumni Association offers an alumni loan. Moeder said a student can borrow $500 at a time for a total of $1,000.

Applications are in the Office of Student Financial Assistance in Fairchild Hall.

Moeder said an Alternative Loan is available to students but some do not have a federal guarantee.

"This means the government won't pay back the loan if defaulted, and the loan does have a higher interest rate," he said.

Moeder said a federal Perkins loan is available to students who have exceptional financial need.

The loan is from K-State and allows students to borrow $3,000 a year for a total of $15,000. He also said student employment is an option. Students can get a part-time job on or off campus while taking classes.

> "I FILLED OUT AN APPLICATION FOR SUMMER FINANCIAL AID, AND, BASICALLY, I WAS GIVEN A LOAN FOR TUITION. MY PARENTS AND GRANDPARENTS CAN AFFORD TO HELP ME, BUT I WANT TO DO IT ON MY OWN."
> HESPER THOMPSON
> senior in animal science

Even though the priority deadline for summer assistance has passed, Moeder said students still can receive assistance.

"Students can always apply after the deadline," he said.

"But the money might not be here for the first day of summer classes."

Hesper Thompson, senior in animal science, said she got a loan for seven hours of summer school.

She said she received about $4,000 a semester in loans, grants and work study.

"I filled out an application for summer financial aid, and, basically, I was given a loan for tuition," Thompson said. "My parents and grandparents can afford to help me, but I want to do it on my own."

Moeder said the average debt for undergraduate K-State students is $12,000 by graduation.

"It's not too terrible when you think about it," Moeder said. "It is over four years, and it's a good investment in life."

FBI to add clinic bomber to 10 most-wanted list

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The FBI is preparing to add Eric Robert Rudolph, charged with the nation's first fatal bombing of an abortion clinic, to its 10 most-wanted list and offer a $1 million reward for his capture, officials said Wednesday.

Bureau officials originally had planned to announce that the 31-year-old carpenter from Murphy, N.C., was added to the list Wednesday but postponed that until next week while they obtained the expected approval from the Justice Department to boost the reward from $100,000 to $1 million, according to Justice officials, who requested anonymity.

Rudolph has eluded capture since the Jan. 29 bombing at the New Woman All Women Clinic in Birmingham, Ala., which killed a security guard and badly injured a nurse.

Within a week of the blast he was sought as a material witness. By Feb. 14, he was formally charged with using an explosive device to damage the building, which carries a possible death sentence.

Late last month, Rudolph was the subject of a false alarm in Denver after someone thought he had spotted the license plate for his truck, which actually had been found abandoned near his hometown in North Carolina within days of the bombing.

On March 17, the task force investigating the Birmingham bombing was formally merged with an older task force assigned to solve three bombings in Atlanta, including one at Centennial Olympic Park in July 1996.

Although the merger announcement made no mention of Rudolph, the now-superseded Atlanta Bomb Task Force had been looking into whether he might also be responsible for the Atlanta attacks.

Officials said they have found some tenuous links between Rudolph and some of the Atlanta bombs, but not enough to charge him in those blasts.

The new Southeast Bombing Task Force is working in Alabama, Georgia and North Carolina on all four attacks. It includes the FBI; Treasury's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms; the Alabama Bureau of Investigation; the Birmingham Police Department; the Georgia Bureau of Investigation; and the North Carolina State Bureau of Investigation. Some state and local law officers are deputized to carry out certain operations for the federal task force.

Links between Rudolph and the Atlanta bombings so far could be merely coincidences, said a senior agent on the case, who requested anonymity.

"But in this business if you can pile up enough coincidences, sometimes you get somewhere," the agent said.

Investigators have been trying to learn if Rudolph was in Atlanta when bombs exploded at Centennial Olympic Park, at an abortion clinic in January 1997 and at a gay nightclub in February 1997. Agents hypothesize that the same person or people were behind all three Atlanta attacks.

The Olympic and Atlanta abortion clinic bombs had one-eighth-inch thick steel plates, designed to direct the blasts. These plates were found long ago to have the same general formulation of steel, the agent said. Some of the manufacturers who make that type of steel sold it in the Southeastern states, including to a metalworking plant in Franklin, N.C., where an associate of Rudolph's worked, the agent said.

Another federal agent said lab analysis showed that 1 1/2-inch flooring nails used in the bombs in Birmingham and at the Atlanta abortion clinic came from the same batch as nails found in a storage shed rented by Rudolph. The batch of nails "was produced and sold in a small area," this agent said.

Similarities between some of the Atlanta bombings and the Birmingham bombing include letters signed "Army of God" claiming responsibility.

Hillary Clinton refuses to answer 2 questions in Whitewater testimony

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As a grand jury in Arkansas watched first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton's videotaped testimony Wednesday, her lawyer confirmed she had refused to answer two questions in the Whitewater inquiry on grounds of marital privilege.

Questions in Saturday's five-hour White House session that Clinton declined to respond to dealt with "conversations that plainly fell under the long-standing common law privilege for marital communications," attorney David Kendall said in a statement.

After the grand jury gathered at the federal courthouse in Little Rock, Ark., Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr spent about 45 minutes in the area of the building where the grand jury meets.

Deputy Whitewater prosecutor W. Hickman Ewing Jr., who conducted most of the questioning of Clinton, declined to comment as he entered the building carrying two briefcases.

Clinton's invoking the marital privilege is the latest instance of Whitewater prosecutors being unable to get answers to questions in the investigation.

Starr will speak on the issue of executive privilege in a speech Friday to a convention of the Association of Defense Trial Attorneys in San Antonio.

President Clinton has invoked executive privilege to protect the confidentiality of some conversations with top aides in the investigation involving former White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

The Justice and Treasury departments argue that Starr can be barred from questioning Secret Service officers about President Clinton's relationship with Lewinsky.

Jack-in-the-Union

"MUDJACKS," BY RICH BERGEN, GRADUATE TEACHING ASSISTANT IN ART, IS ONE OF MANY PIECES OF ART BY BERGEN ON DISPLAY AT THE UNION ART GALLERY.

Graduate teaching assistant uses jack as inspiration

Albert Einstein said, "Imagination is more important than knowledge." As one of the 20th century's most notable geniuses, Einstein was not saying knowledge is unimportant, rather that an imagination lets people use their knowledge.

This is the idea behind the exhibit at the Union art gallery by Rich Bergen, graduate teaching assistant in art.

"Anybody who looks at the work in the exhibit is going to have their own interpretation, and that's great. I want people to use their imagination," Bergen said.

Bergen used his imagination to create the wide array of art in his exhibit. His work includes graphic design, giant sculptures and 3-D work viewed with special lenses. There is one similarity, though. They are all inspired by a jack.

"I took one simple object, a toy that we played with as kids, and let my imagination run wild," Bergen said.

Bergen said he has been working on the series of jacks for several years, and as long as he continues to get new ideas and still is able to find joy in his work, he will continue. His first endeavor into the jacks came in the design of his piece "Jack in the Box."

"I was looking for something to put in the metal cube to make music, and I thought jacks would work. They didn't, but I created my own jacks by bending metal, and those worked," Bergen said.

Bergen said he became interested in the different ways he could portray the jacks and began experimenting with not only sculpture, but graphic design. The graphic design allows a two-dimensional object to look three-dimensional. Bergen created a jack on his computer and began experimenting with different angles of perspective, which can take up to 12 hours to render.

The exhibit, which will be up until Friday, features three of these different perspectives of his graphic design. There is a two-hour reception at 6 tonight at the gallery where people will be able to meet and talk with Bergen. None of his work is officially for sale, but Bergen said it is a possibility.

One piece already has been sold to the Rock-A-Belly Deli and is on loan for the exhibit. Another, "The Lumberjack," has been on display on the west side of Memorial Stadium but has been moved to a median east of the K-State Student Union for the exhibit.

Bergen said he came back to school to further his education in art and to get his art teaching degree. He wants to do his own work, as well as work by commission, but does not know if he will teach, he said.

After Bergen graduates, he said he plans to go to Salina to work with his father, Richard Bergen, who is also an accomplished artist.

Ska bands to fight racism with national tour

▶BANDS TRY TO RAISE $15,000 TO SUPPORT ANTI-RACIST GROUPS.

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

Politics and ska don't seem to go together, what with most ska bands nowadays singing about beer, girls and assorted other topics.

However, the Ska Against Racism tour unites several ska bands under the umbrella of fighting racism in all forms, both personal and institutional.

The tour has been selling out venues all over the country and features Less Than Jake, the Toasters, Mustard Plug, Blue Meanies, MU330, Kemuri, Five Iron Frenzy, and Mike "Bruce Lee" Park.

Park is the former lead singer of Skankin' Pickle and is now the head of Asian Man Records. He, along with Rick Bonde, president of the Tahoe Agency booking agency, came up with the idea. Asian Man and Moon Ska NYC Records are co-sponsoring the tour as well.

Mike Hodgson, senior in English and pre-law, said he wants to go to the show, because "some of my favorite bands are going to be there, and it's an important cause.

"I think that people don't hear as much about racism now because it's not as overt. It's institutionalized these days, and we need to make it less so. This is a positive thing," he said.

Park also has lined up several anti-racist activist organizations, including Anti-Racist Action, Artists for a Hate-Free America and the Museum of Tolerance. All these organizations will be selling merchandise, handing out information and speaking between bands.

The tour's goals are to raise awareness about racism and to raise funds for these three organizations. Park hopes to raise at least $15,000.

Hodgson also said he thought a lot of people are going to go to the show, not only because of the bands, but because they want to do something to fight racism.

"It's not preaching to the converted because it's doing something proactive," he said.

By using ska music's infectious beat and positive messages, tour organizers hope to educate people about fighting racism in their own communities and helping them make a difference.

The Ska Against Racism Kansas City tour stop is Wednesday at the Beaumont Club in Kansas City, Mo. Tickets are $15 in advance plus a service charge from Ticket Central. It's an all-ages show, and it starts at 6:30 pm.

Tickets still are available but are going fast, so get yours today and help make a difference.

Less Than Jake, the Toasters, Mustard Plug, Five Iron Frenzy, MU330, Kemuri (from Japan), and Mike "Bruce Lee" Park. Venue: the Beaumont Club, Kansas City, Mo. All ages show. 6:30 p.m. Wednesday. Ticket price: $15 plus service charge through Ticket Central. (800) 771-3666.

McCain announces performances for next fall, spring

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

"The King and I," "Swan Lake" and a performance by the Flying Karamazov Brothers are among those scheduled for McCain Auditorium in the next school year.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said "The King and I," a musical written by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II, will be performed at McCain at the beginning of the fall semester. The date has not been confirmed yet.

"Since we typically book only one performance, we're farther down on the priorities of the presenter who would book full weeks, or eight performances, first," Martin said.

Also coming to McCain during the fall semester are the Flying Karamazov Brothers. They will be performing their show "Sharps, Flats and Accidentals" sometime in mid-September.

"They clown around and do a great deal with verbal wit and outrageous puns," Martin said. "They don't fly, their names aren't Karamazov, and they aren't brothers. We haven't presented them here in long time."

Family Weekend will feature the husband-and-wife team of Bolcom and Morris. They will be joining their musical talents in a celebration of George Gershwin's birthday.

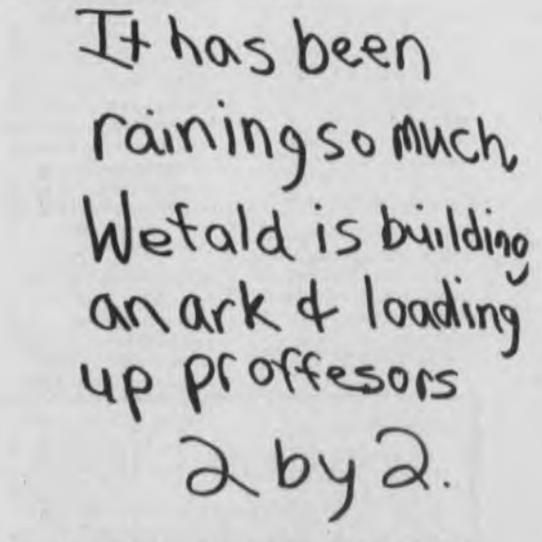
"Family Weekend falls on George Gershwin's birthday to the day. We thought this would be a good way to celebrate it," Martin said.

The spring semester will begin with the Russian National Ballet's performance of "Swan Lake" on Jan. 28. Martin said this is the first time the ballet will be performed in McCain.

"This is the classical ballet everybody — every woman dancer especially — wants to dance in," Martin said.

The play "Halley's Comet" will come to McCain in February. John Amos, who appeared in the TV series "Good Times," will be featured in the play.

"He played the dad on the show and also did other TV things," Martin said. "This play is about a man who saw the comet as a child and is now seeing it in his old age for the second time. There could also be an opportunity for local people to appear in the play."



The Broadway musical "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum" also will be presented in February.

The Chieftans, an Irish muscial group, will be at McCain in April. Martin said this is the best-known Irish group in the world.

Martin said all dates, events and programs are subject to change without notice. An announcement with an order blank listing all the shows will be available later this spring, and a discount again will be offered to students.

"Be sure to buy tickets and come. Don't miss out on it," Martin said.

$3.7 million addition unveiled at Manhattan Public Library said.

"People seem to be really pleased with what they see. You see people come into this atrium, and people just seem to stand and watch. It's really a delightful area," Atchison said.

Judith Edelstein, library assistant director for services, said she also noticed positive responses to the atrium.

"I've been standing in the area and hear people come through and heard them say, 'Wow,'" she said.

Other responses were more subdued.

"There was a patron who walked in and looked at the new part and kind of said, 'Well. It looks just like the old!' And we were amused at that reaction because that's exactly the effect the architect was trying to capture," Atchison said.

The space created by the addition has allowed the collections to be organized more coherently, he said.

"We've been able to pull our nonfiction collection together and put it on one floor. We've never been able to do that before," Atchison said.

To complete the move into the new part of the building, the library's 60-person staff worked all its normal hours, moving books, cleaning and moving bookshelves, Edelstein said.

New employees were hired, including more reference librarians and more custodians to maintain and clean the building, which is nearly twice as large as before.

Much refurbishing was done, Atchison said. Carpeting that had been in place for 30 years was replaced, and the library association, a voluntary organization that raises funds for the library, contributed new furniture.

The computers also were upgraded during the library's closure.

"That upgrade is going to allow us to put our catalog on the Internet," he said. "That will really open the door for people getting at the library collection and using the library services in that way."

The library catalog will be online in about a month, he said.

Atchison said he thought the $3.7 million cost for construction, which began in November 1996, was modest.

"Considering the cost of construction these days, we feel like we got a lot for our money," he said.

Atchison cited the library's architect, as well as the community, as keys to the library's success.

"We've been fortunate enough to have an architect that had an appreciation for the original structure, and have a community that was supportive of the library and allowed us to do this kind of project," he said.

issues will be addressed in the renovation.

"The building is 42 years old, so the plumbing needs and electrical needs and mechanical needs are all things that have changed over the years will be completely upgraded and provide a safer environment for our customers based on codes that exist now," he said.

"Basically it's just going behind the back of the house and addressing mechanical rooms and our sewer system, which are things you can't see but you will appreciate."

Pitts said another important aspect of renovation will be temperature zones.

"By developing smaller zones in our heating and air conditioning system, hopefully we will have an opportunity of meeting comfort zones of our customers," Pitts said. "We also plan to improve lighting to make it more energy efficient."

Another part of the project is to renovate the two significant revenue centers: the Stateroom cafeteria and the K-State Union Bookstore.

"We will reconfigure these areas," Pitts said.

"We will do this by making the cafeteria a food court, and we just finalized our last contract to go in the food court, which is Burger King."

Pitts said the size of the bookstore also will increase.

"We were able to increase the square footage in the bookstore so we can bring in different product niches," he said. "We will try to identify those things so that we can meet the needs of the campus."

A separate part of this project is to address the plaza area between Seaton Hall and the Union.

"We hope this will become a very popular outdoor gathering point for our campus," Pitts said.

"We envision a nicely landscaped area, a stage area, outdoor dining space, and a water feature, but this will be the last part of our renovation that will be dealt with."

There also will be a wheelchair-accessible ramp placed in the recreation area, and the roof will be worked on.

Areas of the Union that will not be addressed during this renovation include the exterior of the Union and some of the meeting rooms.

"With the Union being 250,000 square feet, we do try to come up with ideas to make the place more pleasing," Connaughton said. "We have a list, which is now a five-year plan, for the Union that will go on during and after the renovation."

There will be three ways Union customers can keep track of the renovation.

"The Union's Web site will have current information on the renovation, which will direct students where they may enter and when the food service will be open or closed," Pitts said. "There is also a quarterly newsletter that will be distributed to the campus and to other entities who will be using the Union, and then we will buy ads once a month to put in the Collegian."

Abortion pill boasts 92-percent success rate

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — The first formal testing of the abortion pill RU-486 in the United States found that it successfully ended pregnancies in 92 percent of women.

Although the drug already has been tested and used widely in Europe, the Food and Drug Administration requested additional studies of its safety and effectiveness be done in the United States.

Those results are being published in today's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine. The drug's U.S. developer said it hoped to have the pill on the market sometime next year.

In this study, the drug was slightly less effective than in earlier European experiments, where it triggered abortions in 96 to 99 percent of women.

Success meant the women expelled their fetuses without the need for surgery. The approach was considered a failure if women did not abort after 15 days, although some abortions might have occurred after this.

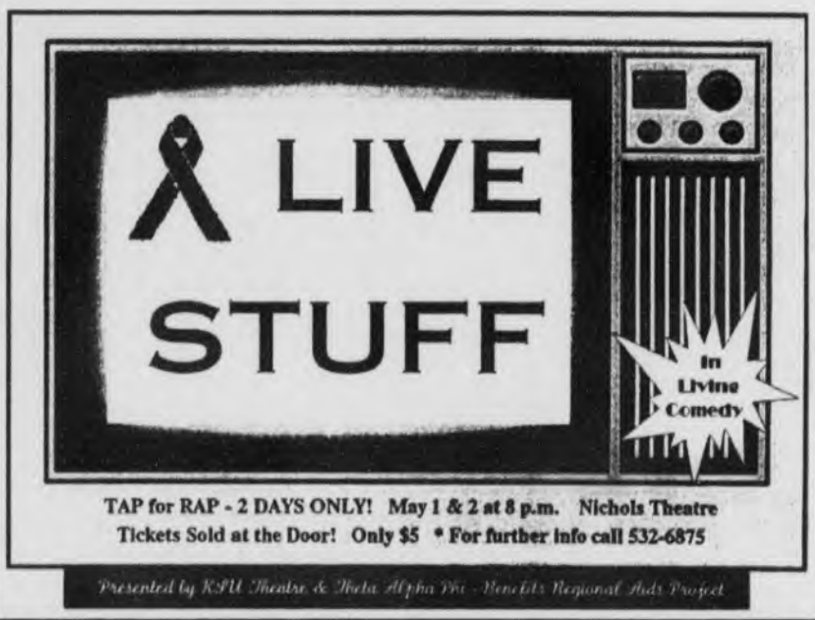
The researchers said the pill might have appeared to work less well in this test because U.S. doctors are inexperienced at giving abortion medicines or because of the way the study was designed.

"The side effects we saw are what are expected for the drug to work," Ann Robbins said.

Robbins was the study's manager at the Population Council, which was given U.S. rights to the medicine in 1994 by the French manufacturer Roussel Uclaf. The FDA declared the drug safe and effective in 1996 after reviewing European data and hearing preliminary results from the U.S. study.

The Population Council licensed its rights to the drug to the Danco Group, a newly created pharmaceutical firm, after plans to get the drug made by a Hungarian company fell through.

At Danco, spokeswoman Heather O'Neill said the company has found a manufacturer, which she declined to identify, and is working out details with the FDA to get the drug on the market in 1999.



The study found the drug was most effective when given within 49 days of gestation. The longer a woman had been pregnant, the less likely the pill was to work. Among women who were pregnant between eight and nine weeks, it was 77-percent effective.

The drug, also known as mifepristone, works by blocking the effects of a hormone that is necessary to maintain pregnancy.

Two days after taking the pill, the woman must return to her doctor's office to take a hormone called mispristol, which causes uterine contractions to expel the fetus. The woman must wait there four hours in case of severe reactions, such as diarrhea and nausea, and about half abort during this time.

The study was conducted on 2,121 women at 17 Planned Parenthood clinics, freestanding abortion clinics and university hospitals across the country.

Investigation unresolved in embezzlement case

▶SGA ACCOUNT MISSING MORE THAN $100,000 IN UNRECOVERED FUNDS.

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

Two years after an alleged embezzlement from the Student Governing Association foundation account, the investigation has not concluded and the funds have not been recovered.

The exact amount of embezzled monies never has been released, although it's reportedly more than $100,000.

Acting on concerns from vendors who had not been paid, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, asked for an internal audit through the Division of Administrative Finance in April 1996.

Information gathered during the investigation was given to Ronnie Grice, director of K-State Police, and the Riley County Attorney's office. After the dismissal of a classified employee a few weeks later, the Kansas Bureau of Investigations became involved.

The bureau was handling the investigation, but was not able to show any action in the case and finally dropped it.

While the statute of limitations on state or federal embezzlement was nearing its deadline, no progress in the case was made. There has been no arrest and no restitution of monies to the SGA foundation account.

This interest-bearing account, created in the mid-1980s with student funds allocated by SGA legislation, was for one-time expenditures that benefit the student body.

The administration was notified in December 1997 that the bureau had made no progress. In part because the statute of limitations is longer for tax evasion, the case would be referred to the Internal Revenue Service.

"We've been very disappointed in the way this was handled," Bosco said. "From the beginning, we hoped students would receive restitution and that the individuals involved would be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. This means our money back and jail time."

Bosco said in a Feb. 24 letter to Attorney General Carla Stovall that four student leaders expressed frustration and questioned the integrity of the bureau investigation in a letter of their own.

"Our students have been involved in this since day one because it was their money, but they spoke for all of us when expressing their frustration and outrage," Bosco said.

Aaron Otto, senior in political science, helped write the letter, along with Jeff Dougan, 1997-98 Student Senate chair; Tim Riemann, 1997-98 student body president; and Chris Hansen, 1996-97 student body president.

The letter said, "We believe the University did all it could to comply and cooperate with the investigation, however, when examining the results, the only victims were the students themselves. We would appreciate an inquiry into the KBI's apparent inability to investigate this alleged embezzlement case properly."

Otto said the intent of the letter was to get some answers. News of the alleged embezzlement became public at the beginning of his term as student body vice president.

"They said it was under investigation and it was in the right hands, and we cooperated as much as we could. It's always been a nag on my mind, but I had confidence that it was being worked on and would be settled," Otto said. "I would periodically ask people in Anderson Hall if there was progress and they would just get this frustrated look on their face."

Hansen said the letter was a culmination of frustration and concern that the investigation wasn't a priority.

"For a year, I was asked to be a steward of student money, and I believe in what SGA does," Hansen said. "I don't think any of the four of us could have left without asking these questions. You can see that KBI just dropped the whole thing."

In a March 10 return letter from Larry Welch, director of the bureau, he said the criticism reflected in the original letter from the four senators was warranted.

"Your complaints are well-founded, I am embarrassed and very sorry," Welch said in the letter.

Welch said the investigative effort in this case did not approach remotely the high standards traditionally found in bureau investigative efforts.

"I apologize. The fault is mine. The responsibility is mine. Any explanation is inadequate and no excuse is possible," Welch said in the letter

The four students received the letter of response from Welch shortly after the letter was sent to Stovall.

"Live Stuff," an annual benefit for the Regional AIDS Project, will be at 8 tonight and Saturday in Nichols Theatre. Cost is $5.

This year's program will include the audience favorite, "Sock Puppet Theater," from past shows as well as modern dance, live musical numbers and several new TV-style comedy skits.

"Live Stuff," known for its use of improvisational humor, is created almost entirely by the participating students.

"It's a huge creative process," said Jennifer Huston, graduate in theater and production stage manager. "Students bring skits and skit ideas and we audition them, then we have about three days to work before we start lighting and tech. It's really fast-paced. This year the theme is about a guy watching TV and flipping through the channels."

"Live Stuff" is produced by the Theta Alpha Phi theater honorary and often is called "TAP for RAP."

Human ecology dean to retire after 15 years

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, is retiring after 15 years at K-State.

Stowe came to K-State in 1983.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean and professor of human ecology, said Stowe has been an important part of the college's success.

STOWE

"Dean Stowe has kept the college focused on its mission, which is to serve Kansas by discovering and disseminating information," she said.

"My favorite quote of hers is, 'What does the world need of us?' and that's the right frame of mind for leading a college. That's the kind of vision that has helped the college to advance."

Some of Stowe's accomplishments include increasing the annual grant funding to $5 million, increasing scholarship funding to $280,000 annually and coordinating moving the Communication Sciences and Disorders Program to the college.

On the national level, Stowe was named to the U.S. Agriculture's National Agricultural Research, Extension, Education and Economics Advisory Board.

BRIDGING THE GAP

MICHAEL ERIC DYSON, AN AWARD-WINNING AUTHOR, ORDAINED BAPTIST MINISTER AND ACCLAIMED SCHOLAR, SPOKE THURSDAY MORNING AT MCCAIN AUDITORIUM. DYSON'S SPEECH, TITLED "RACE RULES: NAVIGATING THE COLOR LINE," FOCUSED ON RACE AND GENDER ISSUES.

Columbia professor urges elimination of all stereotypes

JILL BUTLER
Kansas State Collegian

A large audience gathered in McCain Auditorium on Thursday to listen, laugh and learn as Michael Eric Dyson, professor at Columbia University, spoke about race, ethnic issues and gender.

Dyson, an award-winning author, ordained Baptist minister and acclaimed scholar, is one of the youngest stars in the support of African-American intellectuals.

Dyson served as director of the Institute of African-American Research at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and recently has been appointed to the Institute for Research in African-American Studies at Columbia.

He said race and ethnicity will play a key role in how we think of one another in the approaching millennium.

Dyson quoted lyrics and related them to his message throughout the lecture.

"I like the way he compared things to songs and then quoted them," said Jackie Snow, sophomore in park resources management. "I really enjoyed what he had to say."

Dyson said family values always have played a part in people's lives, but back in the day when father knew best and mother handed out the lunch, there were no African-Americans represented on television.

He said animals had programs before African-American people did.

"Lassie and Flipper had shows before we did," Dyson said. "A collie has a whole show and we can't get one — what does this tell you about America?"

He said there has been change and with change came pain.

"There's been progress, but with it comes struggle," he said. "People have to raise their voices, which is not comfortable in the mainstream, and that's why there's a black, white tension. It's not the only tension, but it's the major one."

Dyson said whiteness and American go together, and that is the norm in this country.

"Sometimes when I go on TV, they ask me if I'm black first or American," he said. "I'm both at the same time."

Dyson said all of society has had a part in shaping this country and democracy, and we should see it as ours all together.

Dyson said he sees many of the black football players dating white women, adding this is because some consider the men to be "studs."

"We are all mixed and impure," he said. "It shouldn't matter who you love or what a person's stereotype is, just love them as a human being."

Dyson also focused on stretching race and ethnic problems to try also to reach gays and lesbians and to touch on gender issues.

He ended his lecture with a quote that got the audience on their feet.

"We're all in the same boat," he said. "If there's a hole in the ship, you're going to sink like everyone else."

"IT SHOULDN'T MATTER WHO YOU LOVE OR WHAT A PERSON'S STEREOTYPE IS, JUST LOVE THEM AS A HUMAN BEING."

College of Business Administration has social to celebrate achievements of year

The College of Business Administration had an annual social late Thursday afternoon to bring professors and students together to celebrate the year's activities and achievements.

Eric McEachen, president of Alpha Kappa Psi and senior in finance and accounting, said Alpha Kappa Psi was spearheading the event, which consisted of ice-cream eating, raffles, and gift certificates.

"This is basically an engagement to bring students and teachers together in a nonstressful social environment," McEachen said.

Among the year's activities, Alpha Kappa Psi has brought several speakers to Manhattan, including Dan Colantone, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, and the president of the First National Bank of Omaha, Neb., to educate students as to opportunities in the business world.

"We bring in company representatives to speak to our organization so our members can see what's out there," McEachen said.

McEachen said that last weekend, some Alpha Kappa Psi members traveled to Denver, to tour various companies and learn about their operations as well as look for future employment opportunities.

Jennifer Woodford, member of Alpha Kappa Psi and sophomore in business administration pre-professional, said the criteria for becoming a member of Alpha Kappa Psi includes being a student in the business college, having at least a sophomore standing , and having a grade point average of 2.5 or above.

McEachen said that in addition to fund raising, Alpha Kappa Psi also is involved in community service activities.

"It is good to get good publicity about fraternities where deserved," McEachen said. "They receive so much negativity."

"Every semester we hold several events on campus, including international movies, speeches and culture night."

This semester's culture night begins with a sample buffet and food competition, followed with a speech by Kansas resident David Thompson on his experiences living and working on different continents.

2 convicted killers captured in Missouri following escape from Fort Leavenworth

FORT LEAVENWORTH, Kan. — One of two convicted killers who escaped from the U.S. Disciplinary Barracks was shot during the pair's capture Thursday in rural Missouri, officials said.

Kenneth E. Taylor, 33, and Jeromy J. Willis, 28, were discovered missing about noon Thursday during an inmate count, said Fort Leavenworth spokeswoman Janet Wray.

They were found just across the border in Platte County, Mo., at about 1:15 p.m., she said.

Willis was shot by officers during the capture, Wray said. He was taken to a hospital in critical condition. Details of the shooting were not available immediately.

Both men had been sentenced to life in the military prison on convictions of murder, but details of their crimes were not available immediately.

Taylor arrived at the prison in February 1993. Willis arrived in December 1993, authorities said.

Details of the escape were not being released because the case is under investigation, Wray said.

Bank rampage leaves loan officer dead; 19-year-old robber later commits suicide

CARMEL, Ind. — A man who just had been refused a loan at a bank opened fire on four employees Thursday, killing the woman who had given him the bad news.

He then robbed the bank and later killed himself in a treetop as police closed in on him.

Penny Schmidt, 32, was shot several times and died Thursday morning, authorities said.

Three of her co-workers were injured, one critically. A massive manhunt ended when Antione Whitehead, 19, fatally shot himself.

The shooting was followed less than an hour later by a bank holdup several miles away in Indianapolis. A suspect in that robbery was injured critically after he was shot by police.

The FBI said the two robberies apparently were not connected.

"It could turn out that it's just two guys who decided to try to rob banks in that part of town on the same day," sheriff's Detective Dennis McAtee said.

The shooting where Schmidt was killed occurred at a KeyBank in this well-to-do suburb north of Indianapolis.

After Schmidt told Whitehead his application had been denied he walked out into the morning rain. Schmidt chased after him to offer an umbrella when she didn't see him get into a car.

Before she could get to him, he turned around, walked back into the bank and opened fire, and made off with an undisclosed amount of cash.

"It almost appeared the money was an afterthought," said Hamilton County Prosecutor Sonia Leerkamp.

Police set up roadblocks and began searching the woods near the bank, using dogs and an infrared camera from a TV news helicopter. Police and FBI agents surrounded the woods, and three schools nearby locked their doors, allowing no one in or out of the building.

By late afternoon, police closed in on a man sitting in a pine tree about 50 feet above a residential neighborhood. They heard a shot, which they later determined was Whitehead killing himself.

"We believe he did" shoot himself, Hamilton County Prosecutor Sonia Leerkamp said.

It took police more than two hours to free Whitehead from a tangle of branches, using a cherry picker to maneuver among the treetops and around electrical wires.

A short time after the holdup, police got a report of an attempted robbery at a People's Bank in Indianapolis about seven miles away. A gunman fled in a stolen car and was wounded when officers shot out the windows. He then tried to run away but was caught as news helicopters hovered overhead.

The suspect, who was not identified, was shot three times below the waist and was in critical condition.

A witness to the first robbery, Ron Prater, told police he was in an auto license branch and saw a man in the parking lot who had been shot.

One woman was shot in the neck and hand and was in critical condition. A 21-year-old woman who was shot in the shoulder and a 44-year-old man who was shot in the arm were in fair condition.

Retiring associate dean to leave legacy of academic assistance programs

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

After retirement, few deans can boast of being the catalyst for improving widespread academic assistance and effectively targeting at-risk minority students.

William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, not only has earned those bragging rights but also can talk about the 6,000-foot mountain in Antarctica named after him.

A historian and former law student, Feyerharm also earned the Congressional Service Medal for participation in a U.S. Antarctic Research in 1959 and 1960, long before he even heard of K-State.

"I was attracted to a commitment to undergraduate education and a good student-affairs staff trying to improve undergraduate education and advising," Feyerharm said.

In 1979, Feyerharm became the assistant vice president of academic affairs at K-State and was responsible for student retention and enrollment. After working as assistant provost, Feyerharm was hired in 1985 as a dean for the arts and sciences college.

Feyerharm helped establish the Academic Assistance Center and academic support programs for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. He established an Academic Core Curriculum Program, a Directed Study Program and a mentor program for student athletes. These learning centers provided tutoring, study sessions and monitoring of at-risk students.

"We began to define what the problem was and why underclassmen weren't succeeding," he said. "We hit the basics. No amount of high-tech stuff can replace the ability to read a book."

> "FRESHMEN ARE THE MOST OBVIOUS TO TARGET. THEY'RE LOOPY, WONDERFUL AND MOST HAVE NEVER HAD TO STUDY. IT'S MY FEELING THAT NO OTHER INSTITUTION WOULD TREAT THEIR ROOKIES THIS WAY.
> WILLIAM FEYERHARM > retiring assistant dean of arts and sciences

Feyerharm said he believes underclassmen need structure. Students also need to hone writing and math skills while learning to study effectively.

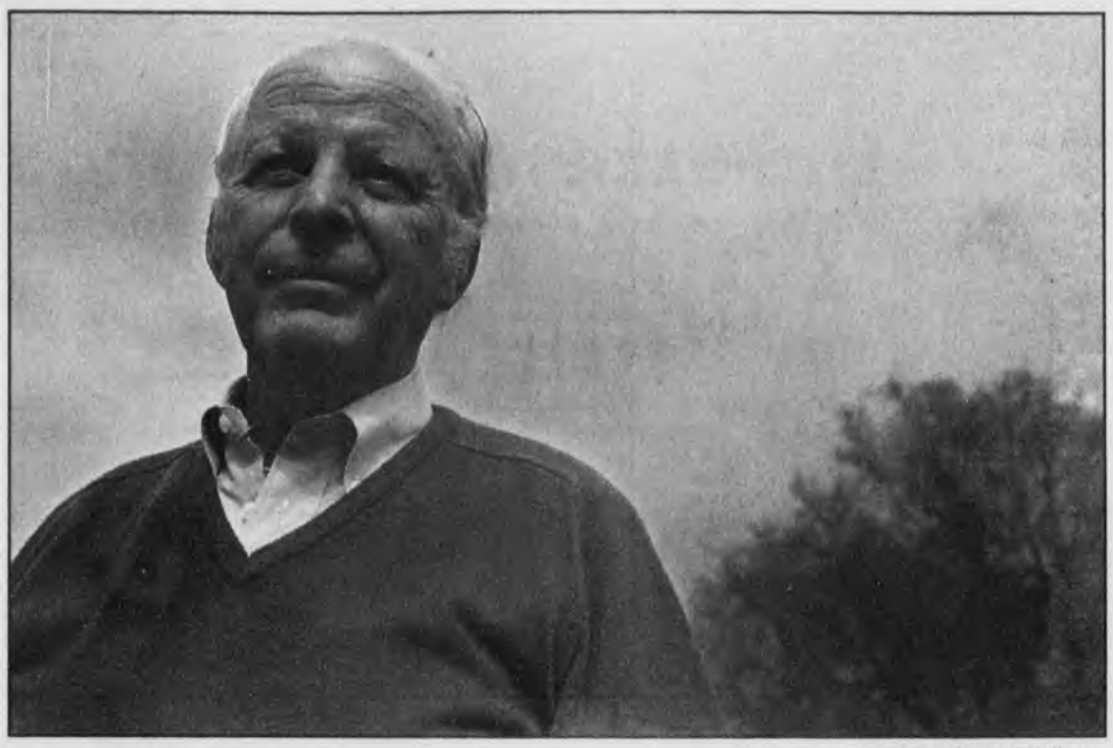
"Through all this, there's a moral commitment that if students land on our doorstep and we take their money, then we should give them an opportunity to succeed," he said.

"Freshmen are the most obvious to target. They're loopy, wonderful and most have never had to study. It's my feeling that no other institution would treat their rookies this way. We have to be there for them."

Feyerharm's work with at-risk minority students, especially those in K-State's intercollegiate sports programs, earned him the 1991 Presidential Award for Distinguished Services to Minority Education.

In recent years, Feyerharm actively has been actively involved in planning academic programs for the residence halls. There is an orientation on every floor, study sessions and a system of monitoring students for retention and help.

"My dream is that as a university, we can target freshmen in an almost military-strike collaboration with a war room of people defining who needs help and how to provide it," he said.



While at K-State, Feyerharm has supported funding for programs to assist at-risk students. As assistant dean in the largest college, he also has implemented programs and worked directly with students.

Continuing to teach courses in English and European history, Feyerharm said he was committed to keeping in touch with students within the classroom setting.

"I'll miss the kids most, of course," he said. "All this effort is for them — to lead students to think. It's been my primary mission to get them to think for themselves."

Feyerharm and his wife of 35 years, Ann, have a son, Robert, and a daughter, Libby, and two grandchildren. After retirement at the end of this semester, Feyerharm said he plans to take up photography and improve his golf game.

Feyerharm has served as presidential appointment to the Board of Student Publications for the past decade, and also has served on the Committee on Academic Policy and Friends of the Library.

WILLIAM FEYERHARM, ASSOCIATE DEAN OF ARTS AND SCIENCES, WILL BE RETIRING THIS MONTH. WHILE AT K-STATE, FEYERHARM HELPED ESTABLISH AN ACADEMIC CORE CURRICULUM PROGRAM, A DIRECTED STUDY PROGRAM AND ACADEMIC SUPPORT PROGRAMS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF INTERCOLLEGIATE ATHLETICS. IN 1991, HE EARNED THE PRESIDENTIAL AWARD FOR DISTINGUISHED SERVICES TO MINORITY EDUCATION.

Feyerharm received his bachelor's degree in government and international relations from Carleton College in 1957. He earned his master's and doctoral degrees from the University of Wisconsin in 1964 and 1971, respectively, and studied law at the University of Michigan. He also had a Fulbright-Hayes senior lectureship at the University of Warsaw in 1974-75.

William Brondell, associate professor of English, said Feyerharm is a friend and colleague who will be missed.

"The people who are going to miss him the most are students," Brondell said. "He has helped students get above and around obstacles that keep them from graduating."

Salina campus to welcome 50th anniversary safety conference

BRENNA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

The Department of Aviation at K-State-Salina is revving up its Boeings and Cessnas for the National Intercollegiate Flight Association's National Safety and Flight Conference. Flight schools from across the nation will be attending.

The SAFECON's 50th anniversary conference, Monday through May 9, is the first at the Salina campus.

To prepare for the event, a hangar has been painted and electricity rerouted to create a convention center suitable for an open-house environment.

"We are putting on a little more of a show with a static display where there will be more airplanes than contestants on the ground," said Peter Kennedy, assistant department head of aeronautics.

Also in store for the open house is a new $500,000 flight simulator with wrap-around graphics on display in Salina for the week.

The competition will bring people from 30 different colleges and universities to compete for the top flight team and top individual performances.

Winners could be offered American Airlines training, which would put the pilots on their way to a type rating enabling them to fly legally a 737.

Kennedy said maturity and experience level are important qualities to have before a flight student can pass the training necessary for a type rating.

"It's like asking someone to run when they have just learned to walk," Kennedy said.

Other awards include trophies and medals to be given out for competitors qualifying in other events.

There are a variety of ground and flying events in which contestants will be competing.

Kevin Maturey, sophomore in airway sciences and vice president of the flight team, said there will be a contest to identify parts of airplanes.

"In aircraft recognition, we will be shown part of the plane and have to identify it, which is hard because a lot of them are international planes," he said.

Another event is the message drop, where an object is dropped on a target.

In the navigation event, calculated latitude and longitude coordinates are plotted to one of three points indicated by a letter marked in a 10-foot square that each plane must fly to within a certain amount of time.

Amanda Hoffman, freshman in airway sciences and flight-team member, said most contestants participate in three ground and one flying event.

The only female member of K-State-Salina's flight team, she said she hopes to win the top female spot in the competition, although she'll be competing against top flight schools from the University of North Dakota and Embry Riddle.

Slated to speak Friday at the event are Jim and Martha King of the King Flight schools.

Kennedy said they are a couple who became multimillionaires from pilot and Cessna CD-ROM training.

As the conference nears, Kennedy said he hopes the weather will improve for the event.

"Hoping that, true to form, the weather will stay bad the rest of the week and with a front coming next week, we'll top whatever they've done in the last 50 years," Kennedy said.

Embezzlement investigation needs resolution

Two years after an investigation into the alleged embezzlement of monies from the Student Governing Association foundation account, it's embarrassing not to have closure.

K-State administrators acted swiftly to launch an internal audit through the Division of Administrative Finance. Students quickly were brought on board and became part of the solution. SGA leaders cooperated with the investigation and helped implement safeguards to keep this from happening again.

A level of trust was breached with the disappearance of this money, and unfortunately, K-State's SGA received a black eye. No one has been arrested, but the investigation did not center around students or members of the SGA.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation obviously never made this investigation a priority. It's handling of the case is just short of sweeping it under the carpet and borders on a gross dereliction of duty.

The apologies from Larry Welch, director of the bureau, and Attorney General Carla Stovall are admirable but definitely qualify as too little, too late. Neither Stovall nor Welch attempted to skirt the issue or pass the buck.

Four concerned students, working with administration, took the initiative in writing the original letter. They did the right thing. This act shows leadership and good stewardship. If there were inquires made before, little noise was made. The Collegian shares responsibility in not making this issue more of a priority.

By all accounts, students and officials from K-State cooperated with the investigation. However, there are no concrete answers yet and no monies have been returned.

Changes have been made, and there are a few positive aspects to emerge from this incident. The internal audit identified loopholes and implemented a more accurate system of checks and balances. In addition to improved communication within the Office of Student Affairs and Services, there is more oversight of student money.

In short, justice has not been served. Students have not been able to benefit from the money as it was intended. No individuals have been charged for this crime, and no restitution has been made.

It's one thing to make sure this type of thing doesn't happen again. Hopefully, the Internal Revenue Service will take it's investigation seriously and there finally will be a resolution.

Mother Earth?

Don't believe everything said about world's environmental crises

VIEWPOINT

SAM SACKETT
Sam is a freshman in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Sam at sjs8645@ksu.edu.

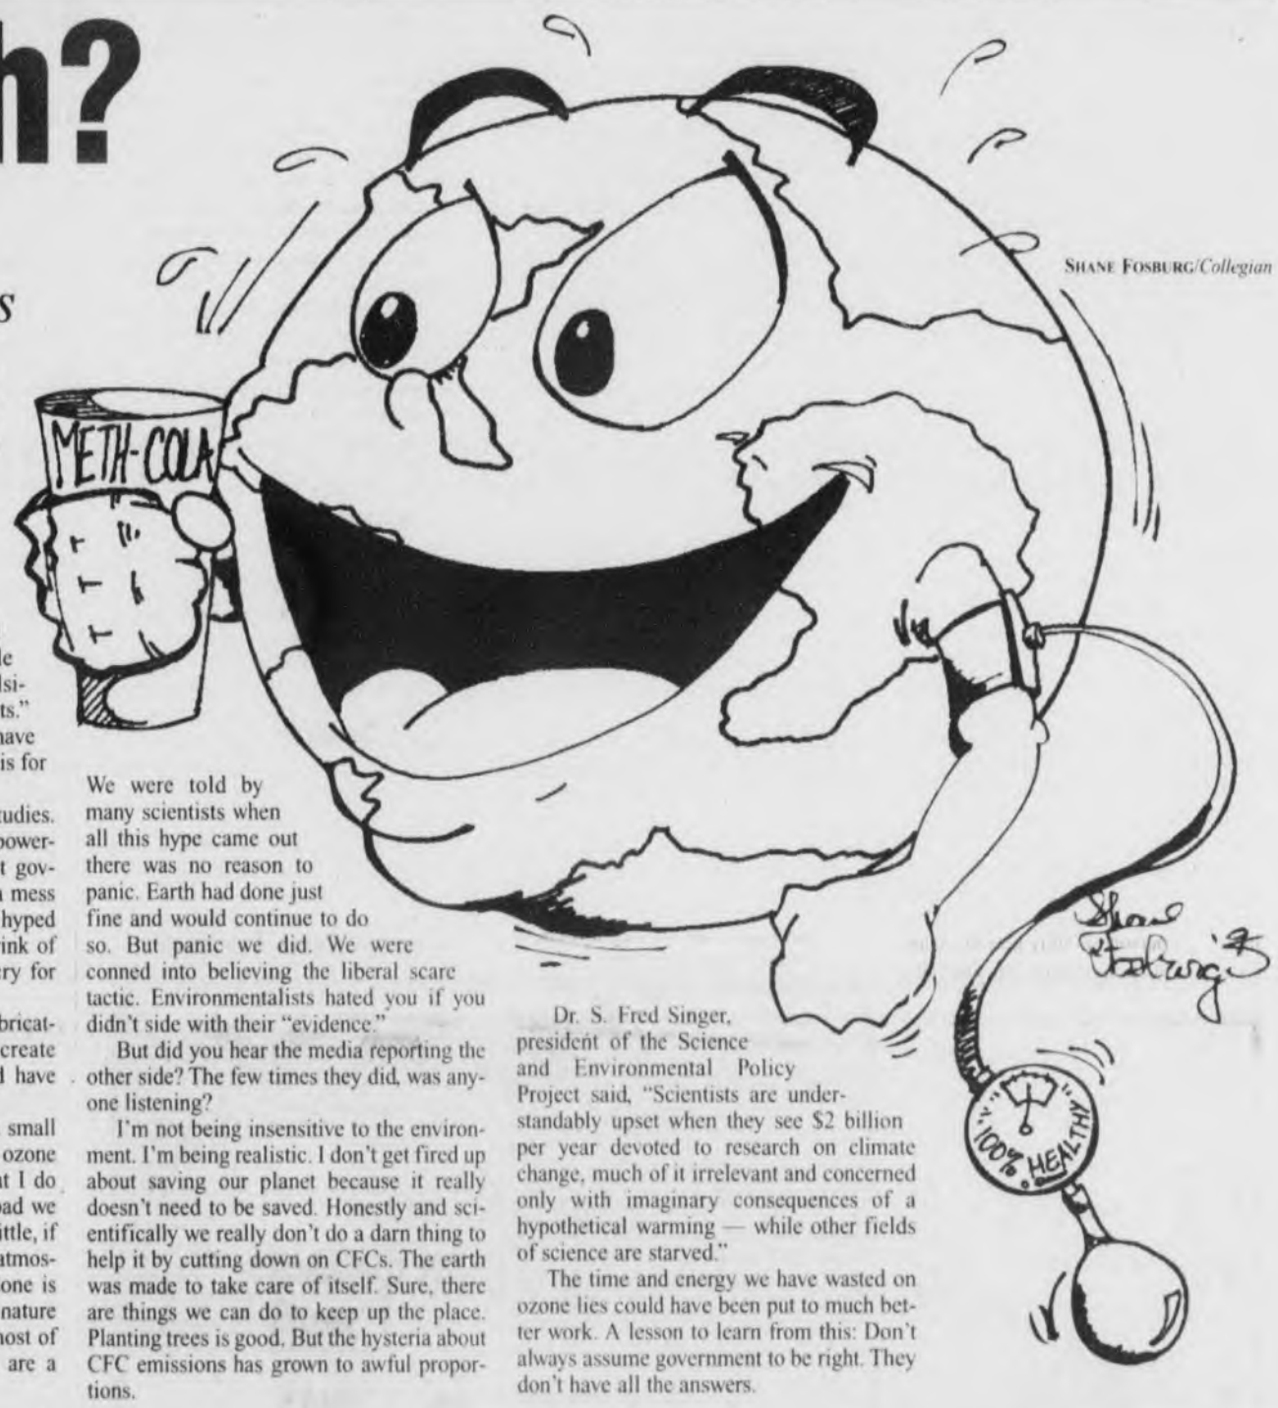
"There is no convincing scientific evidence that human release of carbon dioxide, methane or other greenhouse gases is causing or will, in the foreseeable future, cause catastrophic heating of the Earth's atmosphere and disruption of the Earth's climate. Moreover, there is substantial scientific evidence that increases in atmospheric carbon dioxide produce many beneficial effects upon the natural plant and animal environments of the Earth."

You would think an aerosol-spraying lunatic riding around in a gas-guzzling-carbon-monoxide-emitting sport utility vehicle wrote a statement like that.

Actually, it is a quote taken directly from a petition urging our government to reject the Kyoto Accord, an accord that would mandate enormous reductions of our energy use in the United States. This petition, financed entirely by private donations, includes a list of scientists' signatures totaling more than 15,000 names. Most of these scientists have advanced academic degrees.

It has been said the "silent majority" of scientists finally are speaking out against the political brainwashing that has occurred this past decade. They are speaking out decisively against liberal environmentalists who would have you believe we are destroying our planet. That we mess everything up. That we are wicked people when we drive our low-gas-mileage pickups and vent chlorofluorocarbons.

The facts don't show our contribution of pollutants to be harmful though. The evidence just isn't there. Even the "consensus of 2,500 climate scientists" the White House cites as reason for environmental regulations is itself fictionalized.



Dr. Frederick Seitz, president emeritus of Rockefeller University and past president of the U.S. National Academy of Sciences, had his signature on the cover letter of this petition. His words: "Research data on climate change do not show that human use of hydrocarbons is harmful."

The propaganda that has been pumped into our school systems and televisions, and from the lips of people such as Vice President Al Gore are falsifying and over-magnifying the "facts." Once again the liberal extremists have been caught lying. (We have known this for a long time.)

The harm is not in the scientific studies. The damage comes when you have power-hungry people who like to think that government has the answer. We were in a mess and didn't know it. But thanks to hyped research, we find ourselves on the brink of becoming extinct. Brainwashed, we cry for government regulation, "Save us!"

Why does our government take fabricated evidence from scientists and create crises? This is a question we should have asked a long time ago.

I don't claim to understand even a small portion of the details surrounding ozone depletion and holes in the ozone. But I do know most of what we hear is how bad we are for polluting. The facts are we do little, if anything, to cause damage to our atmosphere. Also, what "harm" we have done is insignificant compared with what nature does every day. I hate to say it, but most of the environmental cleanup agencies are a waste of tax dollars.

SHANE FOSBURG/Collegian

We were told by many scientists when all this hype came out there was no reason to panic. Earth had done just fine and would continue to do so. But panic we did. We were conned into believing the liberal scare tactic. Environmentalists hated you if you didn't side with their "evidence."

But did you hear the media reporting the other side? The few times they did, was anyone listening?

I'm not being insensitive to the environment. I'm being realistic. I don't get fired up about saving our planet because it really doesn't need to be saved. Honestly and scientifically we really don't do a darn thing to help it by cutting down on CFCs. The earth was made to take care of itself. Sure, there are things we can do to keep up the place. Planting trees is good. But the hysteria about CFC emissions has grown to awful proportions.

Dr. S. Fred Singer, president of the Science and Environmental Policy Project said, "Scientists are understandably upset when they see $2 billion per year devoted to research on climate change, much of it irrelevant and concerned only with imaginary consequences of a hypothetical warming — while other fields of science are starved."

The time and energy we have wasted on ozone lies could have been put to much better work. A lesson to learn from this: Don't always assume government to be right. They don't have all the answers.

Co-rec softball rules strikeout with discriminatory regulations

There's nothing like a rousing game of softball to bring people together. The dirt, the crack of aluminum against the ball — yep, the perfect place to put the little woman in her place, that's for sure.

VIEWPOINT

BRANDI HERTIG
Brandi is a sophomore in journalism. You can send e-mail to Brandi at blh0377@ksu.edu.

Playing co-rec softball helped me and my fellow female teammates realize that in a poorly thought-out attempt to help the womenfolk get a fair chance, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex set our sex back about 50 years. I guess the "You've come a long way, baby" slogan only applies if we smoke Virginia Slims with our heads tossed back in a carefree giggle.

The rules for co-rec softball are a little out of whack to begin with — two strikes and the batter's out, no leading off and no base stealing. If one thinks hard enough, the reason to the madness becomes clear. One of my favorite rules is if a male batter is walked, the next batter also has the choice of taking first base. As the rules go, the batting order must go male-female, etc.

OK kids, let's think real hard here. Oh, I guess all males are good hitters, so if the pitcher walks them, the risk of the ball getting whacked over the center fielder's head is nil. Then when the female comes up to bat, the pitcher and the rest of the team can rest assured no runs will be batted in by Little Miss "A League of Their Own." After all, women can't hit a softball very far.

So let's never mind the fact we played teams where the women easily knocked triples and home runs, and the men struck out. If word gets out, who knows what would happen to the state of the world.

Another rule my team and I enjoy so much is the male-female ratio. The ratio has to be even, or there have to be more females than males for a game to be played. One team we played didn't have enough women. Since we all wanted to play, one teammate lent the other team his spectator girlfriend. The rule seems to imply women are more of a handicap than team players or that a male-dominated team is guaranteed to stomp its opponent. So, to make it "fair" for the chicks, we have to have a majority representation on our team.

In co-rec, I can understand the need to have a sex ratio. However, theoretically, there could be a team of all women and just one man, but not the opposite. The message this sends about female athletes is we're not really a force to be reckoned with.

The Rec Complex is not the creator of such sexism, of course. And the stereotypes are just perpetuated by some teams. Like the teams who call their outfield up when a woman comes up to bat, even if they never have seen her hit before. Or does the opposite for a man.

Not all women are afraid to get dirty and sweaty, nor are we all afraid of getting hurt during a game. We can hit, catch, throw and slide as good as anyone else. We can stand alone, without all of the rules that are supposedly there to "help" us. My female teammates and I were surprised there weren't any rules outlawing our breasts during games.

All of the sexist rules aside, the gods of co-rec softball acted like a bunch of 7-year-olds changing the rules in the middle of freeze tag. In the middle of our first game, a Rec Complex guy on an EZ-GO cart came out to our diamond, I guess to make sure everything was kosher. While out there, he noticed our pitcher had an eyebrow piercing and promptly told her to remove it or she'd be removed from the game.

When she contended she had never heard this rule, Mr. EZ-GO said the rule was new, and they hadn't had an meeting to tell all the officials. So, although the rule was not enforced consistently for each team, she was punished nonetheless. She eventually took the bar out, which probably did her more harm than if she'd left it in during the game.

Despite the shameless sexism and general silliness when it came to the rules, we had a good time playing. I'm sure every single team we played enjoyed beating us as well.

But, gosh, when I broke my best fingernail and my makeup got all smeary when it rained on us, I sure was angry. I wish Mr. EZ-GO could've brought me some mascara.

K-State not responsible for transporting drunks

Editor,

In response to Carrie Bellerive's letter about starting a taxi service for students who are intoxicated, I must emphatically say, "What is she thinking?"

Students supposedly come to K-State for an education, and the university's job is to provide that education. It is not, and should not, be the university's responsibility to drive drunken students home from the bars. The students themselves have developed the maturity by the time they enter college to know how to handle themselves where alcohol and drunken driving are concerned.

Implementing a program like this would only encourage irresponsible drinking and eventual abuse of the program. If students are not smart enough to call a taxi or a friend on their own, or to bring along a designated driver, then they deserve to get picked up for DUI.

Senate needs to open lines of communication

Editor,

I am concerned with a problem at K-State. This is my second semester at K-State after transferring from Hutchinson Community College. Since I have been at K-State, I have received no information on or about Student Senate, except when I was bombarded by the Student Government Association elections. When this occurred, I knew little about the candidates and the views they wished to address. I am writing you in support of more communication by SGA to the students of K-State.

Senate needs to realize there is a communication gap with K-State students. Students are not provided with enough information to know about the issues student government is addressing.

The Collegian only covers the big issues, they don't let the students hear how each individual senator feels. SGA needs to make more of an effort to get to the organizations. They do have people assigned to each organization, but do they really make the effort to relay the information about the issues being addressed?

I believe Senate should have a weekly column in the Collegian. The column could have more detailed information about Senate and the individual issues, not just an overview. Senators themselves throughout the year could keep us updated on their views on certain issues, so when voting time came it would be easier to make a decision between candidates.

Hopefully, Senate will recognize the communication gap they have with students, and working with the Collegian will fix this problem, for the good of K-State.

Tryouts conducted fairly

Editor,

I am writing in response to the letter, "Dance tryouts have lost classy tradition" from Danielle Mitchell.

As a former member of the squad for three years, I would like to clear some of the so-called nasty allegations.

The jazz routine contained leaps and turns that Mitchell only had witnessed in ballet.

However, many colleges like ours incorporate these techniques for the squad. We're at a much higher level. The fact that Mitchell never experienced this in her high school drill team only proves a point — that was high school and this is college. No one said college would be any easier.

If Mitchell had visited a K-State basketball game within the past few years, she would see the squad demonstrates these techniques for halftime performances.

Yes, most of what we do on the sidelines are primarily cheers, and we don't get a chance to perform at that many halftimes. But when we hit the court, or prepare for national dance competitions, Mitchell would see the turns and leaps, etc. After all, that's what separates us from the cheerleaders. And for the past four years, these things have been required for tryouts.

Secondly, the jazz routine was completely original.

How do I know this? Because I personally made it up. Perhaps if you would ask any of the past members or flipped through a few of our old videos, you'll see it hasn't been done before. At the same time, as instructors, we were told what to put into the routines for scoring purposes.

As for the girls seen at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex a few days prior, they were there for a completely different purpose. It was in preparation for an event we did earlier that week, and three-fourths of the girls seen there were graduating, non-returning members like myself.

However, I do agree with Mitchell when she stated that everyone deserves an equal chance and they do.

I'm personally sorry Mitchell feels this way, but like I said, this is college. We're far past high school.

Overall, I have the utmost respect for the squad and the girls involved. I also respect those who attend tryouts and give 110 percent each year.

It's obvious to see everyone's dedication and hard work when learning the routines that day.

I've been on both sides of the fence, as an auditioner and as a member, and I only can justify my point of view as you have done.

I have been nothing but proud to be a member of the team and the opportunities they experience, so please don't let one experience change your outlook of the team.

I respect Mitchell's concern on this matter, but encourage her to get all the facts or simply ask someone of higher staff and indeed, she will get all the answers.

Reader believes love should be committed

Editor,

I would like to say a special thank you to Sam Sackett for sharing a positive perspective on the value of a man's character and role in a relationship.

Many people have allowed their emotions and intellects to be clouded over by the status quo. It is very refreshing to see someone demonstrating responsibility and encouraging others to do the same.

I want to echo the significance and incredible value of the love Christ has for his church in parallel to a husband's love for his wife.

A love that is committed, sincere, trusting, encouraging, patient, pure, passionate, self-sacrificing, preserving, serving, protecting and simply beautiful is the love worth waiting for.

Volunteer commends Robben for column

Editor,

I would like to commend Paul Robben for encouraging students and community members to get involved in community service (Volunteer Work Rewards Itself, April 29).

Last August, I joined the Manhattan Jaycees and I have become very active in the community. I have greatly enjoyed the time I have spent doing community service, and I have made numerous new friends. I would also like to encourage everyone to help with some form of community service.

For anyone interested in getting involved in the community, I would also encourage them to join a community service organization like the Jaycees. The Jaycees, or Junior Chamber of Commerce, is a community service/leadership organization for young people. It is an international organization with over 2,600 chapters in the United States. Our local chapter has over 160 members.

We are involved in a wide range of community-service projects and are always looking for new ideas. We also have projects to enrich our members lives and to help build leadership and management skills, such as time and financial management.

By joining an organization like the Jaycees, a person not only gets the satisfaction of helping others, but they also get a chance to meet new people, build their résumé and make professional contacts.

For more information about the Jaycees, contact me at 539-0589 or email me at markl@math.ksu.edu.

Band director says tryouts fair, unbiased

Editor,

I am responding to Danielle Mitchell's letter in the April 9 Collegian regarding her concerns with the Classy Cat auditions. I certainly appreciate Mitchell's comments and suggestions. However, I must correct her erroneous statements.

First, when students preregister for the auditions, they are given a brochure detailing the information that will help them compete successfully, including dance requirements for the audition. The dance techniques Mitchell mentioned are all outlined in the brochure.

Second, the Classy Cats do perform cheer routines on the sidelines, but also perform many styles of dance (including Ballet, Jazz, Contemporary, etc. during half-time routines. Mitchell might have only seen the sidelines routines.

Third, it is true that there are 10 veteran Classy Cats that did make the squad again, plus one alternate, but what Mitchell failed to state was that there were four veterans who did not make this year's squad. Therefore, there are 14 new members of the squad. All returning members must audition every year, a policy I believe creates an atmosphere that promotes excellence.

Fourth, we adhere to the K-State policy of non-discrimination, which is printed in the brochure Mitchell received.

I spend numerous hours recruiting on the phone, writing letters and making personal visits, covering virtually all the schools in Kansas, with a special emphasis on the schools that traditionally have high minority populations. I do my best to promote diversity within the entire K-State band program.

Fifth, Mitchell is correct in her statement that the two prospective coaches were in attendance. If the coach could have been contractually secured by the audition date, she would have been the one to organize and run the auditions, as has been the case for many years. Our flag coordinator ran the flag tryouts, as she has for the past two years.

Sixth, Mitchell did indeed witness Classy Cats practicing at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex days before the auditions. These nine students were practicing for a show they performed two days before the auditions, and three of the students were preparing for the Kansas City Chiefs dance auditions. No students knew our audition routine in advance.

In summary, I have been recruiting, administering, organizing and running tryouts for a variety of bands for nearly 20 years. I consistently work to maintain professionalism and fairness at all times. I realize what an extremely challenging and difficult day it was, not only for the Classy Cat hopefuls, but flags and twirlers, as well.

Many hours and even years have been spent by each of these students to expand and improve their talents with the hope of participating in a group such as ours here at K-State. There are at least two members of our present Classy Cat squad that tried for two years before they finally made the team. This is true persistence and commitment to a cause they believe in.

The students on these teams are some of the hardest working, most dedicated and talented people around. We are all proud of them and their accomplishments. We have selected a great squad of 24 Classy Cats with two alternates, 24 Color Guard members, and three Twirlers out of a pool of almost 200 candidates. With a very exciting and promising fall athletic season on the horizon, this is the best time to be a Wildcat.

I wish Mitchell, and all the students who were not as successful as they wanted to be in Saturday's audition, the best and certainly encourage them to keep working on their skills and try again next year. Go Cats.

SPORTS ROUNDUP

Sports Roundup is your daily dose of the latest scores, stats and news from the world of sports outside of K-State. Compiled from Associated Press reports.

Iowa 3A player of year signs to play with Cats for 1998

Josh Kimm, a 6-foot-1-inch, 180-pound point guard from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has signed a national letter of intent to play men's basketball at K-State, Wildcat coach Tom Asbury said on Thursday.

Asbury said Kimm will have an opportunity to earn playing time at the point-guard position early in his career.

"Josh is a sound, solid combo-type guard," Asbury said. "He is a quality shooter with good leadership skills. If he can improve his ballhandling, he will be a legitimate point-guard candidate. He is a solid player. We are fortunate to have him in our program."

Kimm averaged 21.5 points, 4.5 assists and shot 44 percent from three-point range for Cedar Rapids Prairie High School as a senior. He was the Iowa 3A Player of the Year in addition to being named to the first team all-state squad.

His high school team won the 3A Iowa State Championship last season behind his 111 three-pointers. Kimm owns all the three-point shooting records at CRPHS, including single season (111), career (204) and single game (eight). Last season, he hit at least five three-pointers in 13 games.

Aside from his shooting and scoring numbers, CRPHS coach Denny Thiessen said one of Kimm's most impressive statistics had nothing to do with offense.

"In three years as our starting point guard and four years on the varsity, he averaged just 1.9 turnovers a game while handling the ball 95 percent of the time in our offense," Thiessen said. "He can get the ball from one end of the court to the other safely either by the pass or dribble. He also was able to hit key baskets for us all year."

Thiessen said Kimm, who guided CRPHS to a 20-5 record as a senior and to a 52-17 record as a starter, was the key in the state championship game this year. Down seven points in the third quarter, Kimm made three consecutive three-pointers to take the lead for good to claim the 3A title.

At K-State, Thiessen said he expects Kimm to give the effort necessary to compete in the Big 12.

"It will be a tough step for him," Thiessen said. "Each step gets bigger and more difficult the older you get. I do know that he will do everything possible to become a better player. He will do whatever it takes, just like he did in high school."

Kimm, a McDonald's all-America nominee, is expected to travel to Australia this summer to play on a tour with the Iowa Senior Select Team.

Kimm's father, Bruce, is the bullpen coach of the world-champion Florida Marlins. His brother, Tyson, played college baseball at Creighton and was a member of the Philadelphia Phillies organization.

Patterson inks 6'6" center

Olga Firsova, a 6-foot-6-inch center from Weatherford College in Weatherford, Texas, has signed a national letter of intent to play basketball for the Wildcats.

On Thursday, K-State women's basketball coach Deb Patterson announced the signing of Firsova, who joins guard Essence Perry, of Lawton, Okla., and forward Kristin Rethman, of Centralia, Kan., in K-State's 1998 recruiting class.

"We couldn't be happier in signing Olga Firsova," Patterson said. "Olga is a player we targeted to sign since last year's community college national championship tournament. She is a player who will make an immediate impact in our program and in the Big 12. At 6-6, she gives a legitimate presence in the paint. She has the potential to be a dominant post player in the Big 12."

Firsova, originally from Kiev, Ukraine, averaged 14.5 points, 13.5 rebounds and 7.3 blocks per game last season at Weatherford. She is a second-team National Junior College Athletic Association all-America pick and a two-time, first-team, all-region and all-conference selection.

In her first season with the Coyotes, Firsova was named the Northern Texas Junior College Athletic Conference freshman-of-the-year, averaging 14 points, 13 rebounds and five blocks per game while shooting 86 percent from the free-throw line. Last summer, she was a member of the Ukrainian national team.

"I thought Olga was the best big player in Texas junior college ball this year and one of the best in the country," Weatherford coach Bob McKinley said. "She could have gone to just about any university she wanted to."

Firsova will be the tallest player in K-State history and the third-tallest player in the Big 12, behind Baylor's Tara Eackles (6 feet 7 inches) and Oklahoma State's Devon Magness (6 feet 7 inches). With Firsova's arrival, the Cats have four players taller than 6 feet, with the front line now averaging nearly 6 feet 3 inches

Relaxation techniques help Phi Delts earn spot in championship match

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS

Usually at this time of year, men heatedly are hurling softballs while in the throes of intramural playoffs.

At the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex on Thursday, four fraternity men chose a horse of a different color — horseshoes, that is.

In semifinal competition, Jacob Vogel and Sean Cowherd of Phi Delta Theta fraternity defeated Bret Vondemkamp and Ryan Turner of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity. The Phi Delts won the first two of a possible three games 21-15 and 21-13.

The competition began with a 64-team bracket. Each of the 29 fraternities was allowed to enter two two-person teams in horseshoes. Some houses chose to enter only one or none at all. Vogel, senior in construction science, said he estimated 40 to 50 teams competed in all.

"It's a good way to get points for your house," Turner, senior in agricultural business, said. "Since you get so many points a round, the further you go, the better."

Both teams had byes in the first round and played four other teams to reach the semifinals. Vogel and Cowherd are the defending doubles champions and are on their way to compete for a second fraternity championship.

"We're going to be here another two years," Vogel said. "We want to be the four-year defending champions, to make it a dynasty in the Phi Delt house."

Vogel also was last year's singles champion, and he has a background in the sport to thank for that. His father was the person who introduced him to the game and gave him his first pair of shoes.

"My dad plays a lot," Vogel said. "He goes to the World Horseshoe Pitching Tournament wherever it happens to be. That's where I started."

Cowherd said he was not Vogel's original partner.

"Two years ago, Jacob lost his partner from the previous year," Cowherd, junior in business administration pre-professional, said. "He asked me to do it. I guess I caught on pretty easily."

Although Vogel joked that horseshoes is a more intense sport than flag football or softball, the two teams said they agreed the only necessary skill is decent hand-eye coordination.

"It reminds me of pitching in softball," Cowherd said, "but the shoes don't come back at you."

Turner said the shoes have different weights and having personal shoes is important to be successful. Good shoes cost between $40 and $50 a set.

In a game, each team divides and has one member stand at each stake, or stop, as the K-State teams referred to it. Taking turns, the two players each throw two shoes at the opposite stop.

Because close counts in horseshoes, accuracy is important. If a player's shoe lands within six inches, or a shoe-length, of the stop, the team scores a point. Only the team closest to the stop is allowed to score these points.

The bull's-eye shot in horseshoes is called a ringer. The rulebook defined a ringer as "when a shoe encircles the stake far enough to allow the touching of both heel caulks simultaneously with a straight edge and permit a clearance of the stake."

This shot is worth three points, and both teams can score a ringer.

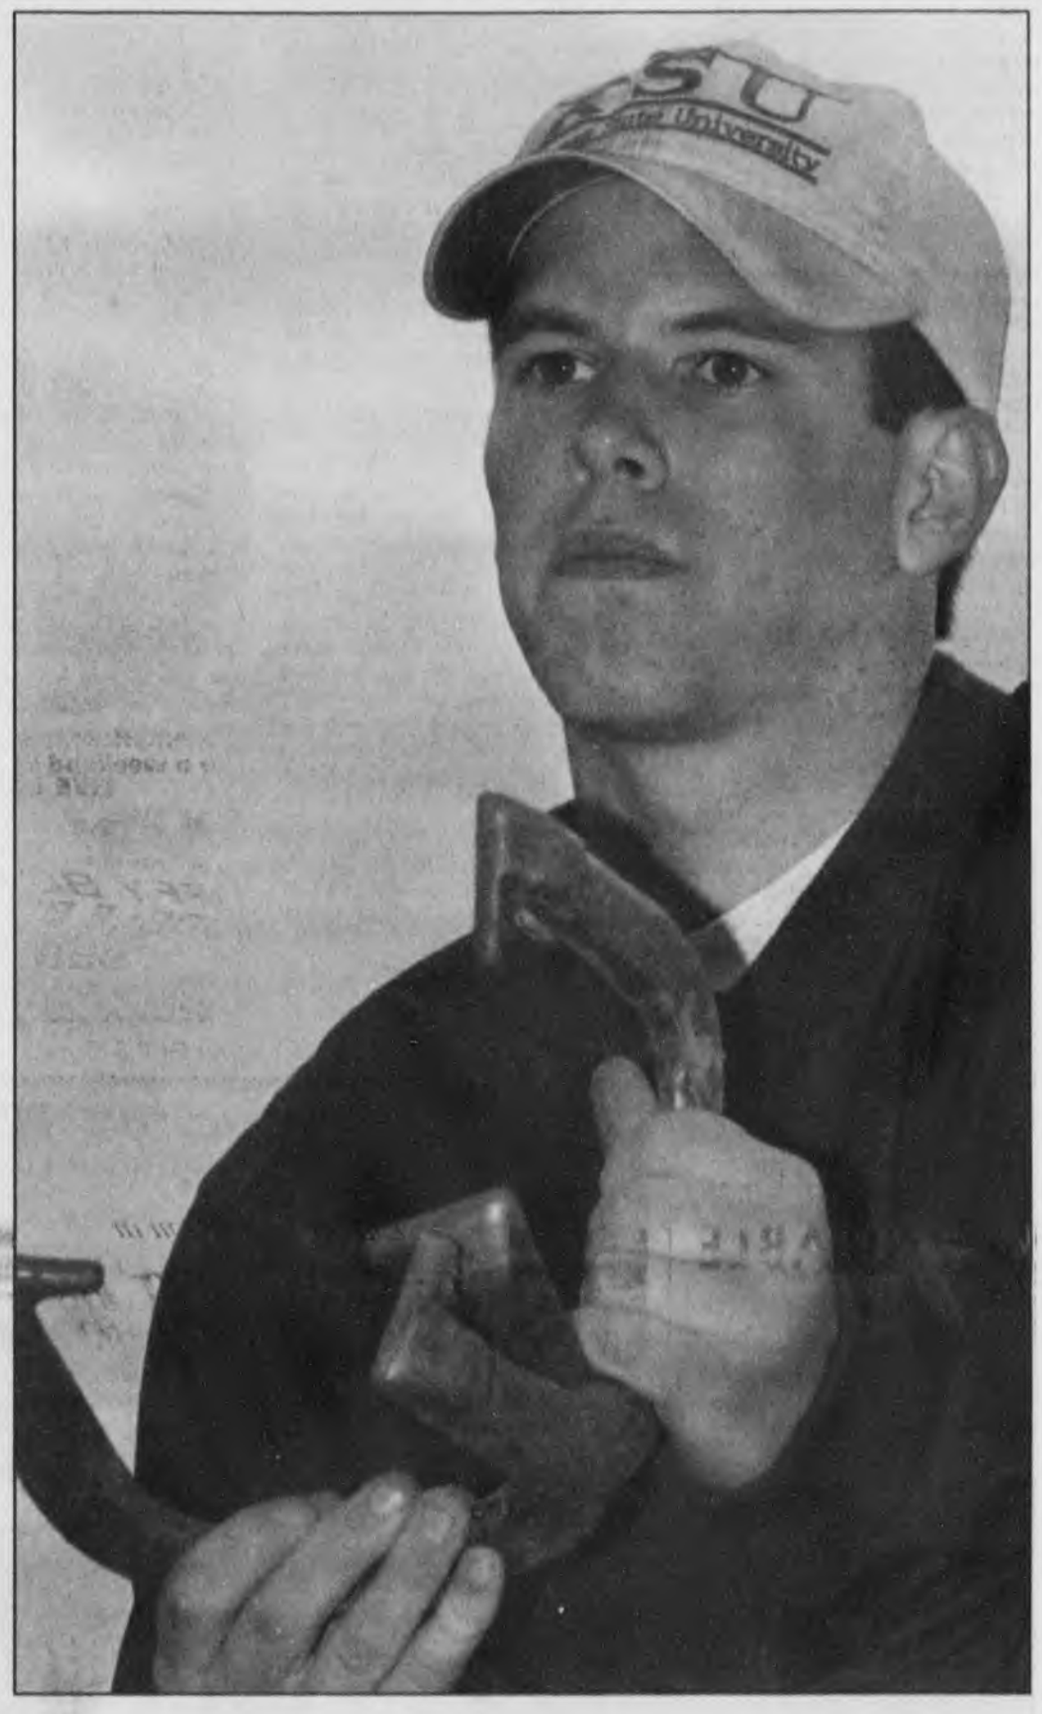
The players often hit the stop when they toss, but a ringer is rarely the result — by novices.

"My dad throws 40- to 50-percent ringers when he plays," Vogel said. "The guy that wins the World Tournament usually throws about 88-percent ringers."

Though the Phi Delts knocked the SAEs out of the tournament, the players were joking after the match about the laid-back atmosphere of the competition.

"I've never seen anyone get mad or throw shoes or anything," Turner said. "It's a relaxing game."

When the Phi Delts played FarmHouse earlier in the tournament, though, it was a different story.



"They have T-shirts and stuff," Vogel said. "They brought their whole house out to watch."

Cowherd said the Phi Delt team will remain relaxed as it competes for the championship and the opportunity to compete for all-university honors.

"Vogel and I usually have a few beers before each match to relax us," he said.

The two players went to Tula's Out of Bounds before Thursday's match for beer and 10-cent wings.

"We did that tonight," Cowherd said, "and I guess it worked."

JACOB VOGEL, SENIOR IN CONSTRUCTION SCIENCE, PREPARES TO THROW HIS HORSESHOES ON THURSDAY EVENING OUTSIDE THE CHESTER E. PETERS RECREATION COMPLEX IN THE SEMIFINALS OF THE INTRAMURALS HORSESHOES COMPETITION. VOGEL AND PARTNER SEAN COWHERD, JUNIOR IN BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION PRE-PROFESSIONAL, WON IN THE BEST TWO OUT OF THREE MATCHES.

UCLA placed on 3-year probation for violating recruiting rules

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — UCLA was placed on three years probation Thursday for violating NCAA basketball recruiting rules and giving improper benefits to athletes when Jim Harrick coached the Bruins.

The only tangible penalty is a reduction from 12 to six the number of official visits to the campus by recruits in 1998-99 and 1999-2000.

However, because the Bruins will have only one senior and one junior on scholarship next year, the penalty should have little affect. Over the past two years, UCLA has averaged 7 1/2 visits per year.

The Bruins remain eligible to compete in postseason play and appear on television.

Additional penalties were not imposed even though UCLA was placed on probation for three years in May 1997 for violations in the softball program.

The NCAA said violations in the basketball program occurred from 1993-95, before the softball violations occurred. The school was placed on probation until April 30, 2001.

"The infractions cited in the NCAA report occurred at least 17 months ago," UCLA athletics director Peter T. Dalis said in a statement issued by the school. "All of the infractions mentioned in this report were part of the Pacific-10 Conference's report.

"No new infractions were found during the NCAA investigation. In addition, the NCAA staff stated that the findings, only when assessed as a whole, not individually, constitute a major infractions case.

"It is important to point out that the infractions were self-reported by UCLA to the NCAA and that the university cooperated fully with the Pac-10 and NCAA."

David Swank, chairman of the NCAA Committee on Infractions, said the violations were worthy of more severe penalties had Harrick not been fired, and said as far as he knew, current coach Steve Lavin was not involved.

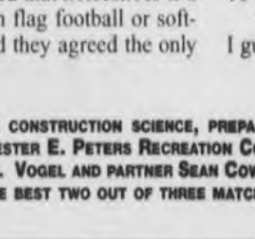
Harrick was fired Nov. 6, 1996, two weeks before the start of the 1996-97 season, for an alleged recruiting violation and lying about an expense account. Nineteen months earlier, he had coached UCLA to its first NCAA basketball title in 20 years.

He was hired by Rhode Island after not coaching during the 1996-97 season.

Harrick, cited for unethical conduct for lying to school officials during a UCLA investigation, was in West Virgina for a speaking engagement on Thursday and not immediately available for comment.

The NCAA said members of the UCLA coaching staff gave entertainment and other benefits to the coach of a club team in Los Angeles whose players included potential recruits.

The coach also was given complimentary tickets to UCLA games and a 1995 championship ring, the NCAA said.



Improper transportation was provided to the mother of an athlete to watch her son play; more telephone calls were made to prospective recruits than are allowed by NCAA rules; and athletes were given tickets to Los Angeles Lakers games.

During the 1995-96 school years and the fall of 1996, 10 basketball players received various numbers of free meals estimated to be worth $6 per meal at a local restaurant owned by two former UCLA players.

The players were required to make restitution to a charity of their choice. In the case of eight of the players, there were as few as three free meals and as many as 18 — a total of 91. The other two didn't know how many free meals they received.

San Diego's Tony Gwynn leads list of living legends we are fortunate to see

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

Dan is a sophomore in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

With the NBA playoffs going on and the Chicago Bulls fresh off their lackluster three-game sweep of the New Jersey Nets, Michael Jordan's excellence is fresh in everyone's mind. This is the time of year when his fabulous accomplishments and absurd skills are appreciated most and he deservedly is called "the best basketball player of all time."

Aside from Jordan, it's tough to identify all the living legends we are fortunate enough to see on a daily basis. The standing opinion is that our players aren't as good as those in the olden days — but they are.

In 20 or 30 years, people will be talking about players we watch today like they talk about players such as Babe Ruth, Mickey Mantle and Willie Mays.

There are so many of them, and they have great accomplishments so often, that we often take these players and their great careers for granted.

We might forget it, but some players we watch now are the greatest in the history of their sports. Wayne Gretzky is not half the player he was in the '80s but still is regarded widely as the best player ever to lace up a pair of skates. Proof is in the numbers. He has more assists than anyone else has points, not to mention he is also the NHL's all-time leading goal scorer.

Dominik Hasek quickly is becoming an elite goalie to be included with sure-fire Hall of Famers Patrick Roy, Andy Moog and Grant Fuhr. Mario Lemieux retired after the 1996-97 season and could have been the most talented player to ever play hockey. I consider myself lucky to have seen him do some of the things he did, even though I never got to see him in person.

Football also has its share of greats. Barry Sanders, all 5 feet 8 inches of him, might end up being the best running back in the history of the NFL. His moves make him impossible to tackle, and his numbers are unmatched. He was the first player to rush for 2,000 yards since Eric Dickerson did so in 1984.

Baseball might have more living legends than any other sport. All the recent talk is about the Mark McGwire and Ken Griffey Jr. chase toward Roger Maris' single-season home-run record, and they certainly are going to be mentioned among the best sluggers ever, despite the fact Griffey is given many of his home runs by the short porch in right field of the Kingdome.

Greg Maddux is the only certain legend among today's starting pitchers, but relievers continually are setting save records as pitching roles get redefined.

What few people realize is that we might be in the presence of the best pure hitter ever to wear a uniform. Tony Gwynn has spent his entire career in San Diego with a Padre squad that gets little publicity around the country.

The Padres only have reached the postseason twice in Gwynn's career, reaching the World Series in 1984 before being swept by the Detroit Tigers, so Gwynn hasn't been able to shine in the playoffs like Reggie Jackson or even Pat Borders.

But this guy is the best hitter in baseball by leagues. After his rookie year in 1982, Gwynn's lowest batting average has been .309. Recently, he has adapted his style of spraying the ball all over the field to take advantage of inside balls and pull the ball to drive in runs. Last year, he set career highs with 17 home runs and 119 RBIs.

Gwynn's accomplishments are truly extraordinary. He hit .394 in the strike-shortened 1994 season, which eliminated any chance of having a player hit .400 for the first time since Ted Williams in 1941. His career average of .340 is unattainable for most players in a single season, and it is nearly unthinkable to do so in the span of 17 seasons. He could go without a hit in his next 1,000 at-bats and still have a .300 career average.

He only has struck out 390 times in his career, an average of only 24 per year. He is about to reach the 1,000 RBI mark for his career, showing his effectiveness as a hitter by driving in runs and coming through in the clutch by pushing runs over the plate to help his team win.

He also has shown tremendous class by staying in San Diego and staying loyal to the city and its fans, even though he might have gotten more publicity and money in other cities.

Like John Elway, maybe Gwynn will be rewarded for his marvelous career by finally winning a World Series. Hopefully, the Padres' fast start and early division lead will lead the Padres on the way to a championship. I can think of nobody more deserving of one than Tony Gwynn.

Rovelto ignores rankings; team splits up for weekend

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

When it comes to national rankings, K-State track coach Cliff Rovelto said he pays no attention. He said he doesn't even know what his team is ranked right now.

"They really don't mean anything," Rovelto said. "National rankings are subjective rankings of one person. It's kind of just there to peak people's interest."

> "NATIONAL RANKINGS ARE SUBJECTIVE RANKINGS OF ONE PERSON."
> CLIFF ROVELTO > track coach

The Wildcat men are ranked 18th in the nation by Trackwire, a ranking service by track statistician Gary Verigin. Trackwire predicts how teams will place at the NCAA Championships.

Rovelto said he pays more attention to the United States Track Coaches Association team power ratings. The USTCA power ratings, which have the Wildcat men ranked No. 21 in the nation and the women 10th in the nation, predict how a team will fare at a smaller meet.

"Power ratings are more important, because they are a measure of a complete team," Rovelto said. "We try to have a complete team."

The track team will have another test of its completeness Saturday in the Texas Invitational at Austin, Texas, and the Missouri Invitational at Columbia, Mo.

The Wildcat sprinters, high jumpers and 800-meter runners will compete at Texas while the distance runners and throwers will be in Missouri.

A strong contingent of Wildcat 800-meter runners will be sent to the Texas Invitational, including Emily Diederich, a NCAA Indoor Championship qualifier. Rovelto said he expects Diederich to have a strong showing in the 800, unless she has another bout with asthma.

In last week's Drake Relays 800, Diederich had what Rovelto called "an asthma episode" that caused her to run a 2:18.67.

"Sometimes it bothers her more times than others," Rovelto said of Diederich's asthma. "It's one of those things where she can be fine 20 minutes later."

Diederich also will compete in the 4x400-meter relay with Darcy Morris, Rachel Woods and Carmen Wright.

Morris and Woods, both of whom have been faring well in the sprints during the past month, also will run the 400-meter dash. Morris finished the 400 in 55.49 seconds, and Woods finished in 55.81 seconds at last week's Sooner Outdoor Invitational.

Another part of the Wildcats' strong contingent in the 800 meters will be Istvan Nagy and Scott Galas. Nagy and Galas both were part of last week's Drake Relay 4x800-meter relay gold-medal team.

Cats need wins to improve tourney chances

This weekend's three-game series with KU is huge for the K-State baseball team.

In dire need of some wins, K-State (19-25, 8-14) sits four games out of the sixth and final spot for the Big 12 postseason tournament.

Can't make it out?
Too busy to make it to the game this weekend? Listen to all three games on KSDB-FM 91.9 FM as Brian Smoller and company give the play-by-play and color commentary.

The Cats have just six conference games left — the three against KU and three at Texas Tech next weekend.

Meanwhile, KU sits at 18-28 overall and 5-19 in the conference and has clinched last place in the standings after being swept by Texas A&M last weekend.

K-State head coach Mike Clark said this series is critical for the team.

"We're in if we win these last six," Clark said. "The main thing is that we need to keep our target on Friday"

"If we don't play well Friday, that won't make any difference. It would just be that much harder than reaching those goals."

Texas Tech is being investigated for numerous NCAA violations including some on the baseball team. It is possible Tech could get suspended and ousted from the Big 12 Tournament, but Clark said he wasn't worrying about that.

"There are a lot of magic numbers floating around," he said. "A lot of different things could happen, but we can't worry about the stuff we can't control and worry about the stuff we can control, like winning on Friday."

K-State is tied with Iowa State at ninth. Ahead of the Cats are Nebraska (7-10) and Texas (9-14). However, if K-State ends the season in a tie with either of the aforementioned teams, it would have the tiebreaker because it won the series against those teams.

"We know what we need to do," center fielder Eric Sommerhauser said.

"I really think we need help to get in, but if we continue to win, then that's all we can do."

K-State won a three-game set from Iowa State last weekend, including a 22-8 thumping on Sunday. The Cats made a good showing in series with Baylor and Cal-State Northridge.

"Our teams have always played well late," Clark said. "Our coaching staff continues to do a good job of stressing fundamentals."

"I think we're coming together at the right time, but I hope this little hiccup with the weather doesn't set us back a bit," he said

The Cats are a bit banged up right now, too. Sommerhauser still is nursing an injured ankle and is questionfor this weekend. Sommerhauser is wearing a flexible fiberglass cast on his ankle after rolling it on a ball during warmups before the Bethany game.

"It hasn't bothered me a whole lot since then," Sommerhauser said. "It's still tender, but I think I'll be all right for the weekend."

Furthermore, pitcher Tim Johnson as well as Trent Bridges is out with a shoulder injury. Mark English is out for the season after undergoing an appendectomy.

"We are a little thin right now, especially in the relief pitching department," Clark said. "We'll shuffle some kids around and we'll go at it, though."

The first game of the series is scheduled for 7 tonight at Frank Myers Field. Saturday's time has been moved back to 4 p.m., and the series concludes with a 1 p.m. start on Sunday.

High ad rates, lengthy episode on tap for 'Seinfeld' swan song

▸NETWORK EXPECTING 90 MILLION TO WATCH FINAL INSTALLMENT OF HIT NBC SERIES.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Advertisers can be sure of one thing when it comes to "Seinfeld" — the finale certainly won't be about nothing.

The final episode of "Seinfeld," which is already on track to set a record for the highest prices for commercial time, might gain even more for NBC than originally thought.

The May 14 show might run nearly 15 minutes longer than the one-hour time slot originally set aside for it, sources familiar with the matter said. The program likely is to fetch between $1.5 million and $1.7 million for a 30-second advertisement, said the sources, who spoke Wednesday on condition of anonymity.

The price is less than the $2 million commitment that NBC was said to have received from two buyers a few months ago when the commercial time first was made available. But it still easily surpasses the old mark of $1.3 million set by the Super Bowl football telecast in January.

NBC declined to say what it was getting for ad time on the show. Buyers said the true price is hard to pin down because some ads were sold as part of package deals involving other programs.

The long-running series starring comedian Jerry Seinfeld has attracted an avid following as it tracks the twists in the lives of four single New Yorkers and assorted associates.

The network said it expects as many as 90 million people will watch some of the "Seinfeld" finale.

NBC had sold all 10 minutes of national commercial time available in the hour that the show was supposed to run. It was unclear how much longer the final episode might run or how many extra ads will be included.

To accommodate a potential runover, NBC would shorten a planned one-hour "Seinfeld" retrospective that is to precede the finale.

Advertisers who bought less-expensive time on what is being called the "clips" show are getting first crack at paying the difference to be included in the expanded finale, and the network said it expects to find them willing buyers.

Among the advertisers on the final episode are the brewers Anheuser-Busch and Coors, the credit cards Visa and MasterCard, the fast-food chain Wendy's and Gardenburger, which sells vegetarian sandwich patties.

Wendy's, based in Dublin, Ohio, said it plans to promote a ham-and-chicken sandwich that will be on its menu only for a limited time.

"We need the widest exposure we can, and we are hoping the audience will be there," Wendy's spokesman Denny Lynch said.

Steve Grubbs, who oversees national-broadcast ad buys for the ad agency BBDO Worldwide, said "Seinfeld" was able to command commercial prices higher than for the Super Bowl even though it might attract a smaller audience.

"'Seinfeld' has a unique audience — young, upscale and well-educated. They are light TV users who are not easy to reach with TV," he said.

In addition, he said the final episode represents a one-time-only event for which there is wide anticipation.

"There just aren't that many places particularly at this time of year where you can draw that kind of audience," Grubbs said.

New York City Parks Department pulls plug on 'SeinFest'

▸TRAFFIC CONCERNS, CROWD WORRIES CITED AS REASONS WHY PARTY NOT ALLOWED.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The city where "Seinfeld" is based once again has scuttled an outside celebration planned for its finale.

The city rejected a request by Fujifilm to schedule a party for the last episode of "Seinfeld" in Bryant Park, which covers nearly a city block behind the New York Public Library. The company initially had sought to have the party in Times Square, but that quickly was nixed after police officials said it would create too much traffic confusion.

Police Commissioner Howard Safir and Parks Commissioner Henry Stern said Wednesday they feared the May 14 party would draw a larger crowd than the park could contain.

Dan Sieger, a spokesman for the Bryant Park Restoration Corp., which earlier had approved the party, said 12,000 people safely watched "Casablanca" in the park a few summers ago.

But Safir said even 12,000 "would be too much, and it would probably have drawn many more. It was a public safety concern for me."

> "AS ONE OF HE ADVERTISERS ON THE FINAL EPISODE OF 'SEINFELD,' FUJIFILM HAD HOPED TO BE ABLE TO BID FAREWELL TO ONE OF AMERICA'S MOST BELOVED TELEVISION SHOWS."
> Fujifilm, in a press release

Stern said he feared as many as 35,000 people would have shown up because of the event's heavy promotion.

"Fuji announced they were giving away 5,000 disposable cameras to further enlarge the crowd," Stern said. "And there would be contests, like soup-eating, Seinfeld imitators, stuff like that."

In a news release promoting the free party, Fujifilm said a 15-by-20-foot screen would be placed on the park's terrace and six 50-inch televisions would be placed elsewhere around the park.

Fujifilm said it was extremely disappointed the event was canceled.

"As one of the advertisers on the final episode of 'Seinfeld,' Fujifilm had hoped to be able to help New Yorkers bid farewell to one of America's most beloved television shows," the company said in a statement.

Stern said Central Park's North Meadow, a frequent site for concerts, is available, but Fujifilm would have to get a permit, pay its own production costs and make a donation to defray the city's costs.

"We have not received any expression of interest" in having a "Seinfeld" farewell party there, he said Wednesday evening.

Bryant Park, which had been plagued by drug dealers and deterioration in the 1980s, was reopened in 1992 after a multimillion-dollar restoration.

It is now the home of fashion shows and other events.

College to celebrate 125th anniversary

▸FESTIVITIES PLANNED FOR HUMAN ECOLOGY STUDENTS, FACULTY.

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

The College of Human Ecology, founded in 1873, will be celebrating 125 years of education Saturday with events all day.

The festivities will begin with a groundbreaking ceremony at the Ruth Hoeflin Stone House Child Care Center.

> "WE HAVE HAD 125 YEARS OF CONTINUOUS OPERATION. THAT IS A REMARKABLE HAPPENING. THERE IS SO MUCH TO CELEBRATE."
> BARBARA STOWE
> dean of human ecology

The Stone House, which was bought by K-State in 1925, will undergo a $1.5 million renovation that will more than triple the size of the building.

After the groundbreaking ceremony, there will be a luncheon honoring the significant donors of the project. After the luncheon, the college will be on display in an open house. The open house will include displays and exhibits set up in the lobby and guided tours through the college and the Galichia Institute for Gerontology and Family Studies.

A banquet dinner will conclude the day's activities. The dinner will honor both the 125th anniversary of the college and the retirement of Dean of Human Ecology Barbara Stowe.

Stowe, who has been at K-State for 15 years, said the college is deserving of such a celebration.

"We have had 125 years of continuous operation," she said. "That is a remarkable happening. There is so much to celebrate."

Chris Chalender, alumni coordinator for the college, said much hard work has gone into preparing the celebration.

"It's been busy the past few weeks," she said. "It's also been really rewarding to be able to put everything into perspective like this."

She works with the Human Sciences Institute, a national group in Washington, D.C., that helps to connect human ecology faculty with politicians who deal with family, community and children's issues.

Stowe said she has enjoyed the time she has spent at K-State.

"This has been rewarding," she said.

"I am leaving here with a very good feeling. This is a solid academic college that can contribute many things. It's really remarkable."

Clinton vows to work with GOP

▶ PRESIDENT SAYS FIRING STARR WOULD NOT BE 'APPROPRIATE THING.'

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Embattled by controversy from Monica Lewinsky to Whitewater, President Clinton said Thursday that "these things are distracting" but promised to work with Republicans who are increasingly attacking his integrity.

In his first formal news conference of the year, Clinton barely concealed his ire for Kenneth Starr but said he would not order Attorney General Janet Reno to fire the Whitewater prosecutor. "That would not be the appropriate thing for me to do," Clinton said.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who has dramatically stepped up his criticism of Clinton in recent days, said Clinton should either fire Starr or order his aides to stop attacking the prosecutor.

"Nothing that he says about me personally will keep me from working with him," the president said. Clinton, with an eye on the polls, has maintained all along that he will keep doing the peoples' business throughout the storm of criticism.

Though reporters focused their questions on controversy, Clinton was able to turn the subject to domestic and foreign policy at times during the 55-minute session.

CLINTON

The president said he'd rather not comment on the booming stock market but went on to say, "I hope we can avoid big swings one way or another" in the market.

"I'd rather it be coming up than down."

Clinton said he decided against seeking federal money for needle exchange programs to keep drug addicts from getting AIDS because the benefits are uncertain, and he didn't want to imply that "somehow the government in empowering drug use."

On foreign affairs, he urged the Senate to approve a treaty expanding the NATO alliance toward Russia's frontier, welcoming the "model of bipartisan action" that had the treaty on the brink of ratification.

He said the Cuban embargo has been useful, "but I also believe that we should do more to minimize the damage to the Cuban people." He did not elaborate.

Clinton used his opening remarks to warn congressional Republicans that he would not accept haphazard tax cuts or spending programs, now that America is experiencing an economic renaissance.

"We cannot allow the hum of our growing prosperity to lull us into complacency," he said.

"Americans have worked too hard for too long to put our economic house in order."

He addressed a number of issues facing Congress in the waning days of its session, including a multi-million dollar tobacco settlement. He urged Congress and others involved in the debate over anti-tobacco legislation to settle the matter before the November congressional elections.

"If it is an issue in the November election, it will only be because those people who have a political or financial interest in seeing that this matter is not resolved between now and November prevent it from being resolved.

"The worst thing in the world would be to play politics with our children's health," he added.

"I'm not going to do it, and I hope no one else will, either."

For the most part, Clinton tried to avoid direct response to questions about his relationship with former White House intern Lewinsky or the myriad of problems stemming from the Whitewater matter.

"I really believe it's important that I not say any more about this," Clinton said.

"I really believe that in some ways I am the last person who should have a national conversation about this."

In subtle flashes, Clinton hinted at his anger toward Starr. Asked if he felt responsible for legal fees rung up by his friends and allies, Clinton said tersely, "If there's one thing in the world I'm not responsible for, it's Mr. Starr."

A reporter asked whether Starr's inquiry had "gone beyond the call."

Clinton said, "I think modestly observant people are fully capable of drawing their own conclusions."

Activist to leave Jones' camp to lead castration campaign

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Susan Carpenter McMillan, the sharp-tongued conservative activist who stepped in to spruce up Paula Jones' public image, is bowing out as her spokeswoman.

McMillan said this week she will lead the campaign of a conservative women's group to export California's chemical castration law for repeat child molesters to other states.

Jones' appeal of a judge's ruling throwing out her sexual harassment lawsuit against President Clinton was McMillan's cue to return to her work with the Women's Coalition, which deals with family and children's issues in California.

"I'm trying to wind down from this," McMillan said in an interview Wednesday from her home in Santa Monica, Calif. "Unless it's overturned and Paula goes to trial, there's really nothing much more that I can do."

McMillan and Jones were friends and confidantes before McMillan became her spokeswoman.

She first spoke for Jones on the day the Supreme Court unanimously voted to allow the lawsuit to go forward. She described Jones' reaction to the ruling this way: "In her cute little way, she said, 'Susie, can you believe it? Can you believe it?'"

She also led Jones' legal fund before the conservative Rutherford Institute began bankrolling the court battle.

Last fall, she was accused of causing a rift between Jones and her lawyers at the time, Joseph Cammarata and Gilbert Davis, who quit over what they said were differences over the direction of the case.

McMillan denied the allegation but criticized the two lawyers' handling of the case, including their proposal for a settlement involving payment of $700,000 to her and a vague statement of regret from Clinton.

When Jones and her husband were audited by the IRS, McMillan accused a "very Nixon-ite" Clinton administration of harassment. When lawyers began delving into Jones' sexual past, she suggested that Clinton was addicted to sex.

The frequency of her public pronouncements waned as Jones' new attorneys took firmer grip of her case.

House tries to force vote on retirees' pension hike

▶ STRONG-ARM MOVE FAILS, BUT 3-PERCENT RAISE STAYS UNDER SENATE DISCUSSION.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House tried Thursday to try to force a vote in the Senate on a bill providing a 3-percent cost-of-living increase to all retirees under the state pension system.

The effort failed, but further consideration of the bill was expected Thursday night.

Senate President Dick Bond declared the bill materially altered by House amendments, and sent it to the Senate Ways and Means Committee, whose chairman, Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, is opposed to funding the COLA the way the House proposes.

GRAVES

The bill, which the House passed Thursday, 117-5, passed the Senate as a pay bill, increasing salaries by 4 percent for state employees, elected officials and legislators.

The House amended it to include Gov. Bill Graves' proposed 3 percent COLA for all 50,000 retired state employees, teachers and others under the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System.

The House goal was to force a vote on the COLA issue in the Senate by putting it into the pay bill.

The pay bill had passed the Senate, and all that chamber needed to do was concur in the House amendment to send it to the governor.

Bond's ruling thwarted that plan, requiring a two-thirds vote to force a concurrence vote, which supporters of the 3-percent COLA could not muster.

Bond said the Senate is holding out for House passage of a bill reinstating the bank privilege tax, which was eliminated last year by the bank commissioner, to help pay for the pension COLA.

The president said the Senate wants the nearly $29 million in revenue the privilege tax would bring in annually to pay for part of the 3-percent pension increase for KPERS retirees — amortising the rest of the $108 million upfront cost so that overall it would require $178 million from the general fund to finance.

The House version, amortizing the entire amount over 15 years, would cost the state $228 million.

The House also added amendments to provide the 299 teachers who retired prior to 1971 and are still alive a $100 per month increase in their pensions, at a cost to the state of $400,000, and to give the same 3 percent increase to disabled persons receiving KPERS benefits, at a cost of $3.5 million.

"A number of senators feel strongly that we need to have a method for paying for at least a big portion of the COLA," Bond said. "If the House would pass the privilege tax, it would break the logjam on KPERS and the pay raise bill."

But Rep. Phill Kline, R-Overland Park and chairman of the House Taxation Committee, said he opposes reinstating the bank privilege tax — a tax banks pay in lieu of paying income taxes — because the Legislature just wants to spend the money.

"I don't like tax increases to fund more spending," Kline said.

Microsoft seeking retailers' help in antitrust case

▶ SOFTWARE GIANT HOPES TO KEEP WINDOWS 98 SALES ON SCHEDULE.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Hoping to blunt any government action that would delay the release of its new Windows software, Microsoft Corp. is encouraging computer retailers to spread the word that a holdup would be bad for business.

Several prominent computer-store chains on Thursday said they were telling government officials that sales and advertising plans would be seriously disrupted if Windows 98, Microsoft's new program for running computers, is not released on June 25 as scheduled.

James F. Halpin, chief executive of CompUSA, the nation's largest computer chain, said his Dallas-based company and other Texas businesses wrote a letter to state Attorney General Dan Morales this week saying that any delay in Windows 98 would damage their business.

Texas is one of more than a dozen states investigating whether Microsoft used its dominance of computer operating systems to control other software markets.

The New York Times reported on Thursday that the attorneys general were intent on filing an antitrust case before mid-May in an apparent move to try to block shipments of Windows 98, the update to Microsoft's Windows 95, to computer makers. PC Week Online, an online industry news service, had a similar report last week.

A spokesman for the Texas attorney general had no comment. Officials from other state attorneys general's offices also declined to comment.

Several retailers said they were counting on the software update to draw computer buyers into their stores and strengthen sales of related high-tech gear.

"We're very concerned about it. This is probably the largest new technology release that will be done in 1998," said Nathan Morton, chief executive of Computer City, which has 96 superstores in 45 markets.

Morton said his company, after talking with Microsoft and other industry players, was expressing its concern to government officials in areas where the company does business.

Halpin said a delay could cost CompUSA millions of dollars in sales and wasted promotions, forcing the company to cut jobs.

Mark Murray, a Microsoft spokesman, said the Redmond, Wash. company was working with our partners to ensure that perspective gets heard in this debate.

Some analysts said any effect of a delay on computer sales would be limited because Windows 98 has far fewer improved features as its predecessor system, Windows 95, which sparked an outpouring of consumer demand for PCs three years ago.

Split-screen scenarios eliminate wondering 'what if?'

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

In a surprise move by Gwyneth Paltrow's new movie, "Sliding Doors," Americans discover British humor can transcend Rowan Atkinson and Monty Python.

But don't worry. It's still good.

"Sliding Doors" is a humorous story about what could happen in life depending on whether you make the train.

On what easily could be the worst day of Helen's (Paltrow) life, she arrives at work late, only to be fired for pilfering alcohol from the company still. Not to mention her live-in writer/mooch boyfriend is at home with his ex-girlfriend. Then she races to the subway station, only to miss her train.

Or does she?

In a turn of fate, one Helen misses the train and one Helen makes it just in time. The rest of the movie follows the fates of two Helens (one cuts her hair so she can be distinguished from the other) and how life would change depending on one train.

So:

Helen makes the train just in time to make it home and catch her boyfriend in the act. She leaves him, starts her own business, meets the perfect British gentleman played by John Hannah of "Four Weddings and a Funeral," and falls in love again.

Helen misses the train and, on her way to get a taxi, gets mugged and ends up in the hospital. Her boyfriend, who is alone by the time she gets home, helps her make a new life of menial jobs to support them while he continues his sordid affair.

The side-by-side stories are done exceptionally well, and when they finally converge in the end, you have forgotten they were once the same person.

This romantic comedy, the likes of which hasn't been seen since "Four Weddings and a Funeral," is full of good laughs for both men and women. (A movie has to be good when a Monty Python line works as a motif.) In other words, it's a date movie neither of you will have to suffer through.

Both Paltrow and John Hannah pull off terrific performances, Hannah being just as good as a heterosexual as he was a gay man in "Four Weddings," and the rest of the cast keeps up its end. Congratulations go to all the American actors who pulled off decent British accents.

Although the thinly veiled morals of the story seem a little warped (if you miss the train, your life is screwed), this movie is a new idea among a season of '50s TV remakes and unneeded sequels, and better than that, it works.

Rated R for some sexuality and language, this movie is like getting two films for the price of one, and you won't ask for a refund for either of them.

Simple advice offered to help combat stress of finals: Organization remains key element

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

Organizing your priorities and making lists of things to do might be the key to making it through spring fever, finals or the big move home for the summer.

Katey Walker, professor of family studies and human services, said she thought students would be able to manage the major stresses better this time of year if they learned to get organized.

"There are so many different things going on this time of year," she said. "One of the main causes of stress is that you're afraid you're going to forget to do something.

"People always tend to think they don't have time to plan or get organized," she said. "But it saves time in the long run."

Walker said she thought students who set priorities, make lists and follow their planners are less likely to suffer from this stress.

"Most people today have so many things on their mind," she said. "It's awfully hard to keep them all in your head."

Walker said people should make a list of first or top priorities. She said some people attempt to do several small tasks so they can start with an empty slate. She said these trivial things probably are not as significant and do not move you to your final goal.

"This way, you know you get the critical things done first," she said.

Walker said to use a calendar or daily planner for long-term organization. She suggested starting by writing down everything you need to do for the month. This would include all exams, work schedules, calls home and other activities.

Jeane Bird, sophomore in engineering, said she makes lists to help her keep things straight and to avoid stress. She said she makes a weekly list for homework and keeps a daily planner to plan ahead.

"Make lists no matter how stupid you think they are," Bird said. "They pay off in the long run."

Walker said experience in organizing will allow you to plan further ahead and begin to realize how to deal with the unexpected things.

Many students said they get gratification from checking things of their lists.

"It makes me feel like I've accomplished something," Bird said. "I feel relieved that I have one less thing to do."

Kelly Kiefer, senior in mass communications, said one of the main reasons she keeps lists is because of the sense of accomplishment she feels as she checks things off.

"That's the best feeling in the world," she said. "When you can cross things off, it gives you a constant feeling of accomplishment. It makes you feel like you're ahead of the game."

Walker also said to use a method of reward for incentive to continue the organizational methods. Several students at K-State said they already do this.

"If I've had a tough week and managed to get everything done, I try to reward myself by taking a day off on the weekend or by going out and doing something that doesn't have anything to do with work or school," Bird said.

Kiefer said she allows herself to have fun by spending time with friends or renting movies.

"I go for non-stress, pure enjoyment activities," she said.

Walker advised students to remember that getting organized is not the ultimate goal in doing all of this. Organizing is about finding more time to do fun and rewarding things. The ultimate goal might be different for everyone.

"This time of year, it might just be surviving the semester," she said.

Shootings by students raise level of alert at U.S. schools

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The teacher had just broken up a gym class scuffle when one steaming 13-year-old blurted out a threat to kill any kid who came near him. Official reaction was swift.

Topeka, Kan., school police and the school district psychologist sat him down for a grilling, and officers questioned his mother at home to make sure no guns were handy.

Had the student mouthed off a couple years ago, said principal Steve Roberts, he likely would have gotten off with a hallway lecture.

Across the country, edgy educators like Roberts are paying closer attention to student threats of violence, and children who menace others increasingly risk suspension, expulsion or even arrest.

It's part of the fallout from Pearl, Miss.; West Paducah, Ky.; Jonesboro, Ark.; and Edinboro, Pa.

"These aren't just kids and these aren't just idle threats," said Jim Gilchrist, security director for Topeka schools.

"You have to pay attention," Roberts said. "Four incidents involving 11 deaths and 25 wounded. That's a lot."

Topeka school police determined the boy hadn't understood the implications of his angry outburst, and Roberts and the mother agreed to keep their eyes on him. He was not arrested.

But last month in Forestview Cove, Ky., a high school senior was arrested after threatening to kill his baseball coach for not putting him in the starting lineup.

In Edinboro, friends say they didn't believe 14-year-old Andrew Jerome Wurst when he threatened to kill people. The boy is accused of fatally shooting teacher John Gillette outside a banquet hall last Friday as classmates enjoyed the evening's last dance.

"I didn't intend to do anything like I said," Grant Gagnon, 18, told reporters as he was handcuffed. "He won't play me. This stuff about killing him — I was just joking."

Schools aren't laughing. Just this spring:

• In Klamath Falls, Ore., two middle school girls were suspended after classmates overheard them discussing whom they would kill in a Jonesboro-type ambush.

• In Ryan, Okla., two 15-year-old boys were arrested for threatening to bomb their high school and kill a teacher.

• In Narragansett, R.I., a 17-year-old student smashed a cup against a blackboard when counselors asked about his threat to kill three female classmates. He was charged with disorderly conduct and removed from classes pending psychological examination. Police are "taking aggressive moves because we assume nothing today," said Police Chief John W. O'Donnell.

> "IT CAN HAPPEN ANY PLACE, ANYWHERE, ANYTIME. SAFE SCHOOL PLANNING IS A NECESSITY FOR EVERY SCHOOL IN THE COUNTRY."
> PAMELA RILEY
> executive director of the Center for the Prevention of School Violence

• In Hanover, Pa., two boys, ages 14 and 17, posted a note in a high school corridor demanding administrators give them $500 or they would open fire on students and teachers. The note also praised the two boys arrested in the Jonesboro shootings. The Hanover youths were charged with making terroristic threats and expelled.

• In Mars, Pa., two seventh-grade boys were suspended and a dance planned for this Friday was postponed after a "hit list" of teachers was found scrawled in a student newsletter. Alarmed teachers had balked at chaperoning the dance.

• In Ebensburg, Pa., two 12-year-old boys were suspended Monday and ordered to undergo counseling after school officials found a note in which they threatened to kill seven classmates. They said it was a joke.

• In Spokane, Wash., a suggested list of teachers to be killed was found scribbled on a middle school bathroom door Tuesday. Normally, said superintendent Gary Livingston, the graffiti would simply be washed away. This time, officials took photos for evidence and are trying to identify the scribbler.

"I think those kinds of things have always been happening, that a kid gets mad at a teacher and writes a nasty note," Livingston said.

"You've got to think twice about it now."

Educators cannot afford to assume student threats are mere bravado, said Pamela Riley, executive director of the Center for the Prevention of School Violence, a research clearing house set up in Raleigh, N.C., in 1993.

Students who hear threats should report them to teachers, secretaries or police, Riley said, and then adults must act.

"It can happen any place, anywhere, anytime," Riley said. "Safe school planning is a necessity for every school in the country. We've got to work upstream rather than waiting for something to happen."

Emergency preparation has not kept pace with the worrisome trend toward violence in schools, said Kenneth S. Trump, president of National School Safety and Security Services. This Cleveland consulting firm provides security training.

Teachers still get more training to cope with fire and tornadoes than to deal with gun-wielding adolescents, Trump said.

That might change, too. In Arkansas, where residents still mourn the teacher and four schoolgirls allegedly killed by boys 11 and 13 years old, the attorney general's office is distributing 3,500 brochures with advice for teachers on spotting troubled kids, talking with them and preventing violence.

Educators are advised to investigate verbal threats, violent outbursts, suicidal remarks and previous aggression toward people, objects or animals.

"People used to ignore kids who said they'd kill somebody," said Lawrence Gray, press secretary to Attorney General Winston Bryant. "Usually it'll be a classmate who will hear them. The kids will be in a position to know more than you or me."

Trump said even the best preparation cannot completely eliminate violence in schools. But tragedies like Edinboro, Jonesboro, West Paducah and Pearl can be averted if adults act on student threats.

"Schools, like other areas of society, are crisis-driven," Trump said. "It's amazing how calls increase after a crisis and how quickly we forget."

Institute to provide legal backing for Derby student

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DERBY, Kan. — A middle school student suspended for drawing a Confederate flag now has the support of the foundation representing Paula Jones in her sexual harassment lawsuit against President Clinton.

The Rutherford Institute has agreed to provide legal backing for T. J. West, who plans to file a lawsuit against the Derby School District. He claims the school's policy violated his right to free speech.

"I think it could become a test case," said Jean-Marc Gadoury of the Rutherford Institute, which is based in Charlottesville, Va.

Gadoury helps coordinate the institute's lawsuits, most of which are associated with socially conservative causes.

Gadoury said the foundation has been trying to find a local attorney to represent West for free. He said he is confident an attorney will take the case.

The institute will pay court fees and other legal expenses. Gadoury estimated that if the case goes to trial, it could cost the foundation several thousand dollars.

The controversy began two weeks ago when West was given a three-day suspension for scribbling a Confederate flag on a piece of paper during math class.

The institute sees the Derby suspension as the perfect vehicle to test "zero-tolerance" policies in public schools that prohibit controversial symbols like the Confederate flag.

The Derby policy lists the Confederate flag as a "racially divisive" symbol that is prohibited, except during a history lesson on the Civil War. School officials said West was aware of the policy before he was suspended.

They said the prohibition preserves order and safety and has helped to drastically reduce racial tension in the past three years.

The lawsuit also is likely to call for a temporary restraining order to block the Derby district from suspending other students in similar situations.

The Wests also are receiving moral support from the Sons of Confederate Veterans, a national organization with 25,000 members.

Leaders contemplate safeguards

▶ CHANGES IN SYSTEM MAKE EMBEZZLEMENT LESS LIKELY IN OSAS.

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

Checks and balances within the Office of Student Affairs and Services means an embezzlement of monies in the future is unlikely.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said an internal audit through the Division of Administrative Finance pinpointed weaknesses in the system that could be exploited.

Working with the Student Governing Association student leaders, Bosco helped safeguard the system after an embezzlement was discovered in April 1996. Reportedly more than $100,000 was embezzled from SGA's foundation fund, which is used for one-time expenditures that benefit the student body.

"With the help of our students, we put additional safeguards in place," Bosco said.

"These include additional signatures, keeping original copies of all paperwork and more stringent accounting procedures."

Bosco said although the results from these changes have been good, no system is foolproof.

"The system we employed is no different than most major enterprises where you rely on the trust of your employees," Bosco said.

"I have not lost trust in individuals or our staff over this one isolated incident."

Chris Hansen, senior in nuclear engineering and 1996-97 student body president, said that after the embezzlement investigation began, the way SGA handles funds changed.

HANSEN

"They made the position into an accounting position, and the person there now is certified," Hansen said.

"The best thing that's happened is that changes have been made to see that this doesn't happen again."

Susie Hernandez, Secretary I and a classified state employee, went on sick leave in the middle of spring 1996 shortly before the investigation into the embezzlement charges officially began. Before her termination a few months later in June, she had similar duties to the current position of accounting specialist.

In her position, Hernandez was responsible for disbursement of Student Senate allocations, paying vendors, and executing payroll and interdepartment vouchers.

After Hernandez left, the position was restructured and officially renamed accounting specialist.

An alleged scenario for the embezzlement is that one or more individuals created as many as 50 student organizations and then falsified bills and the payments from the foundation account.

Bret Glendening, senior in agricultural economics, served as Student Senate allocations chair and treasurer in 1996-97. In addition to organizing budget workshops, he kept records and also signed off on purchase orders and interdepartment vouchers.

"After everything, my powers as allocations chair were expanded and we were in the process of setting up a new level of accountability for paying bills," Glendening said.

During the semester, several options were considered, including a push by Hansen to split the position of allocations chair and treasurer. In the end, other checks and balances were implemented.

Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities and services, said she received a copy of the university audit when she started her job less than a year ago.

"The changes were already in place when I got here, but I have to sign every document that goes through our office," Spencer said.

Before Spencer signs off on the disbursement of any money from OSAS, the accounting specialist prepares the paperwork and the SGA treasurer double-checks and initializes it.

"Any paperwork that goes through our office is watched closely. We try to follow general and solid accounting practices," Spencer said.

OTTO

The business office in Holton Hall also has become involved in providing some accounting services and additional oversight.

Aaron Otto, senior in political science and 1996-97 student body vice president, was Privilege Fee Committee chair this year.

"In Privilege Fee Committee this year, we instituted an audit of all student organizations including OSAS," Otto said.

"As a senator, this is very frustrating. We work very hard in Senate and argue for hours over as little as a 32-cent stamp and to have $50 or $100 come up missing and this was more, a lot more."

Stovall, KBI embarrassed by investigation of SGA case

Collegian from Stovall to SGA, she discussed the letter from Welch and expressed her own frustration about the bureau's investigation.

"I have a copy of Director Welch's letter and actually reviewed it prior to it being sent to you. His letter very accurately, although painfully, outlined the inadequacy of this particular investigation and I can offer no more facts to you. And I certainly cannot offer you any excuses," Stovall said in the letter.

> "THE PERSON WHO ALLEGEDLY DID THIS IS STILL IN MANHATTAN AND CAN ALMOST LAUGH AT THE STATE UNIVERSITY."
> BRET GLENDENING
> former student senator

Stovall also said she takes great pride in having oversight responsibilities in the bureau. However, Stovall said steps had been taken to ensure such a "blotch" does not occur again to stain the reputation of the bureau.

The letter said, "The particular agent who was assigned this case did not perform in a manner consistent with the expertise and reputation of the KBI and I am embarrassed by that. I realize my embarrassment does not retrieve for you the money taken. I am encouraged, however, that the Internal Revenue Service investigation may ultimately lead to that result, by ordering restitution from the perpetrator."

Bret Glendening, senior in agricultural economics, was appointed 1996-97 Student Senate allocation chair shortly after news of the six-figure embezzlement was made public.

"From what I can understand, the KBI agent assigned to this case has been dragging his feet on the issue. They aren't any further along than they were two years ago," Glendening said. "The administration won't come out and say it, but I don't think we'll ever get the money back. I don't think it will ever be returned to the foundation account."

Glendening said he hoped the IRS investigation finally will yield a resolution.

"To me, it's pretty embarrassing," he said.

"The person who allegedly did this is still in Manhattan and can almost laugh at the state university. They know they're about to get away with it."

'Live Stuff' to raise money for Regional AIDS Project

she said.

Eunice Dorst, executive director for the RAP, said, "It really pleases me that K-State students are not only aware, but will do something to help."

She said RAP uses the money raised by "Live Stuff" to cover the cost of rent, telephone service and volunteer training, which cannot always be paid for with government funds.

Though the show is important in helping defer overhead, Dorst said another reason to see "Live Stuff" is simply that it is an excellent production.

"'Live Stuff' is great fun, completely a student production. They go all out and do a wonderful job. Even if you're not interested in AIDS statistics, it's still a great show," she said.

Dorst said AIDS statistics also are part of the production.

"They're what we call 'public service announcements,'" Huston said. "They're little tidbits of information about AIDS, safe-sex awareness and the reality of AIDS. RAP will also have a booth at the performance."

Karl Rutherford, graduate in theater and director of the show, said "Live Stuff" is in its sixth year of production.

"This is a great show, and the proceeds go to a great cause. 'Live Stuff' is about students making a difference."

Birth rates among teens decline; minority numbers remain high

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — American teen-agers are having fewer babies, including a dramatic decrease among black teens to the lowest rate on record, the government said Thursday.

Teen birth rates are down in every state. The reasons: less sex and more birth control, statistics indicate.

"Our concerted effort to reduce teen pregnancy is succeeding," said Donna Shalala, the secretary of health and human services.

Black teen birth rates fell by 21 percent between 1991 and 1996. In 1996, 9.2 percent of black teen-agers gave birth, the lowest since the government began keeping that statistic.

Hispanic teens are now most likely to give birth, though their rates also fell, from 10.7 percent in 1995 to 10.2 percent in 1996, the first significant drop since 1991.

Despite the decreases, teen birth rates among both minority groups remain more than double that of white teen-agers, which have been declining steadily since 1991. In 1995, the latest year available for whites, 3.9 percent of those teens had babies.

Nearly half a million American teen-agers give birth each year. In 1996, there was about one birth for every 20 girls ages 15 to 19, down 11.9 percent since 1991, according to the analysis released Thursday by the National Center for Health Statistics.

Most teen mothers are 18 or 19, but the rates dropped most dramatically among girls 15 to 17.

Experts attribute the decline to less sexual activity among teen-agers and greater use of birth control in the age of AIDS.

In 1995, sexual activity among American teens dropped for the first time since the government began tracking information in 1970. Fifty percent of girls had sex in 1995, down from 55 percent in 1990. The rate for boys dropped from 60 percent in 1988 to 55 percent in 1995.

At the same time, teen-agers who have sex are more likely to use contraceptives, particularly condoms.

Thursday's report comes amid intense efforts to reduce teen sex and pregnancy.

States are competing to see which can reduce most dramatically out-of-wedlock births, with winners sharing $100 million each year. The 1996 welfare-reform law gives states $50 million each year for programs to promote abstinence.

The National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy is working with TV networks to promote anti-pregnancy messages while it aids communities with its own programs.

On Thursday, the organization released a brochure to help parents become closer to their teen-agers. It said research shows teens are less likely to have sex and more likely to use birth control if their parents are involved in their lives.

The highest teen birth rate was recorded in 1957, when nearly one in 10 girls gave birth. The rate was significantly higher throughout the 1950s and 1960s, but in those days the mothers were much more likely to be married. In 1950, just 23 percent of mothers 15 to 17 were unmarried; in 1996, it was 84 percent.

Teen pregnancy rates are more difficult to determine than teen birth rates because data on the number of abortions and miscarriages must be added. In 1994, nearly half of teen pregnancies ended in birth.

Thursday's report showed that birth rates declined in every state, though the rates vary widely across the country.

The differences among states are due primarily to the racial and ethnic makeup of the state. States with high black and Hispanic populations, usually in the South or Southwest, tend to have higher overall rates, said Stephanie Ventura, a demographer who helped write the report.

However, she said minority birth rates vary widely among the states. In New York, for instance, 6.6 percent of black teen girls have babies; it's nearly double that in Wisconsin.

Lunchbag Theatre showcases fishy play

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

The stage of the Purple Masque Theatre was transformed into a dock on a saltwater lake in southern Florida on Thursday during the Lunchbag Theatre presentation of "Feeding the Moonfish."

The set for the one-act play was an 8-foot by 12-foot area that made up the dock.

Paige Smith, senior in theater and director of the play, said this play is kind of unusual and is about two people who are lonely.

The bulk of the play is about the interaction of the male character, Martin, and the female character, Eden. The two work together at a restaurant, and one day she hides in his car to see where he goes every day after work, Smith said.

The audience finds out Martin's father died in the lake, and now he talks to the fish to try to find his father. Smith said Martin comes out to the dock every night to talk with the fish.

"The guy talks to fish, who he thinks talk back to him," Smith said. "He is just a little bit out there."

Smith said the play is a lot about forces, like the relationship with the moon and the tides. He said it is also about the forces between people.

"These two people are really drawn to each other, even though they are kind of at each other's throats," he said.

Smith said he chose this play to be presented for the series because it was challenging and interesting.

He said one of the challenges was the set.

"It was challenging to find ways to make that little space bigger than it is," he said.

Sarah Kuhns, junior in music theater, played Eden, and said she enjoyed her part.

"It is a very different role for me because she was sort of lower class," she said.

Tyree Kimber, senior in theater, played Martin, and said it was a different kind of play than he has done in the past. He said he enjoyed playing the part of a crazy guy.

"I think that it is definitely a good play for people to come see," he said. "You can look at it and interpret the ending a lot of different ways."

Lunchbag Theatre is an acting and directing workshop that consists of five student directors and 12 actors. Each student director selects two one-act plays to direct during the semester.

"It is a great opportunity for student directors and actors to get together and express their ideas," Smith said. "The shows in Nichols and McCain are picked by faculty and directed by faculty and then students act in it. This is a great opportunity for students to artistically express themselves."

Springer's producers pledge cutdown on show's chaos

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — The producers of "The Jerry Springer Show" agreed Thursday to edit out the fistfights, the chair-throwing and all the other violence on the nation's top-rated daytime talk show.

The agreement came after a meeting with community activists who staged a Springer boycott and denounced his fists-flying program as a pornographic slugfest.

"It's a wake-up call for television," the Rev. Michael Pfleger said, after meeting for 2 1/2 hours with Springer executives and management at Fox Broadcasting's WFLD-TV in Chicago.

The agreement comes after a tumultuous week for the show: Former guests said they were coached and the fights staged. The show was dropped by NBC's Chicago affiliate because of its tawdriness. WFLD quickly picked it up but also became the target of Pfleger's boycott. The show's producers ordered Springer to tone down the violence.

Now, the violence will vanish completely, said Studios USA Network, the show's producer and distributor, in a statement.

"Studios USA and WFLD met today with members of Chicago's religious community to discuss concerns regarding 'The Jerry Springer Show.' Studios USA confirmed that it will eliminate all physical violence from the series," the statement said.

Pfleger said producers also agreed to edit out fights in shows that already have been filmed but not aired — leaving some to predict Springer viewers will be watching an hour of blank TV screens.

"I don't know what's going to be left," media analyst and talk-show researcher Chris Ryan said.

In its early years, the 7-year-old show actually focused on talk, and violence "was kind of the dessert," Ryan said. "Now it's the whole meat of the show."

Laurie Fried, a spokeswoman for the show, said Springer was traveling and unavailable for comment.

Pfleger said that while the violence was his main concern, he also urged the producers to tone down the show's "nudity, the degradation of women, the obscenity."

Nutrition Notes

Water is as crucial to performance as adequate carbohydrate stores. It is also the best choice of liquid for fluid replacement. It is essential to drink adequate amounts of water before, during and after strenuous activity to prevent fatigue, cramps and heat exhaustion. Two 8 oz. glasses of water two hours before and two 8 oz. glasses 15-20 minutes before exercise will keep you adequately hydrated. During events, (especially during warm weather) it's wise to drink at least 4-6 oz. of water every 10-15 minutes or so. It's also a good idea to weigh yourself before and after prolonged activity and to drink 16 oz. of water for every pound of weight loss.

Fitness Facts

Burning Body Fat -- In order to burn body fat, vigorous, sustained exercise is necessary. For the first few minutes of exercise, your body uses readily available carbohydrates for energy. This form of energy production is called anaerobic ("without oxygen") metabolism. For sustained exercise, your body switches to fat for fuel. This second type of metabolism is called aerobic ("with oxygen") because it uses oxygen to release stored body fat for energy. While any increase in activity will help use excess calories, aerobic exercise is the most effective type for trimming body fat. Aerobic exercise such as jogging, swimming, and cycling help you maintain your target heart rate (220 minus your age multiplied by 60-80%) and use oxygen to burn body fat for energy. YOU ASKED IT?

QUESTION: We don't like the new brackets on the olympic, incline and decline benches! Why did you change them?

ANSWER: The new brackets were a factory re-call/upgrade by the manufacturer (Cybex). In order for us to continue to comply with the warranty and product liability, we had to replace the old detent pin system with the new stable system.

WORKING IT OUT

Get ready for summer and swimsuit weather! Join us in the multipurpose room for exercise sessions. The last day of exercise sessions for the spring semester will be Friday, May 8. Summer exercise sessions will begin June 9. Summer exercise schedules will be available Wednesday, May 13.

WHO'S WHO

Robyn Pierce loves exercising and helping others stay fit! In fact, she loves it so much, Pierce has been an aerobic instructor at the Rec Complex for the past 4 years. She teaches Step, Combo and Interval sessions and enjoys changing routines every week to challenge participants. Pierce will receive her BS in Public Health with a minor in Health Nutrition in May and plans to work as a nutritionist at a fitness center or health club in the Kansas City area. Continuing to exercise after graduation won't be problem for Pierce either - especially since she was just recently selected to be a cheer leader for the Kansas City Chiefs!

Alicia Phillips first began working as a custodian for Rec Services a year ago and has been an assistant building supervisor since last fall. Phillips works a variety of shifts but most enjoys working evenings when it's the busiest at the Rec Complex because she really likes meeting people and making new friends. She will graduate this month with a BS in Marketing /Business Administration and hopes to locate in the Kansas City area.

Jason Hickson, native of Goodland, KS has been a familiar face at the Rec Complex for the past four years doing everything from officiating intramural sports and providing minor machine maintenance to handling the responsibilities of building supervisor. Having already received his BS in Marketing / Business Administration in 1995, Hickson begins graduate school at Mississippi State University in the fall to earn a masters degree in Sports Administration. Hickson's advice to students is to get out and take advantage of all the Rec Complex has to offer. He will miss his many friends and coworkers at the service area, advising them "Don't forget to push the button!"

Area restaurants cited for health-code violations

▶ INSPECTIONS REVEAL NUMEROUS VIOLATIONS IN CITY RESTAURANTS.

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

As temperatures begin to rise, many Aggieville restaurants have started to prop open outside doors to let in fresh air. While the smell of food entices potential customers, the aroma also attracts flies into the eateries.

According to Kansas food service establishment regulations, restaurants that leave outside doors open are in violation of its code.

Joe Kitterman, food service sanitarian for the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department, said customers don't understand the importance of keeping flies out, so they are more tolerant of flies than roaches.

"Sometimes customers are more disgusted with roaches than they are by flies, when, in my opinion, flies are probably more of a public health hazard, in that they've been known to spread diseases more than roaches," Kitterman said.

Auntie Mae's Parlor was cited by Kitterman last year for the open-door violation. Jeff Denney, manager of Auntie Mae's, said the front door is opened briefly for ventilation purposes.

▶ What was found
See Page 5 for more on these health-code inspections and exactly what was found in the Aggieville restaurants.

"It gets pretty stuffy and smoky downstairs, and every now and then we'll prop the door open, and we have a big exhaust fan at the back of the building that we'll flip on and open the door up, just for 10 or 15 minutes, and kind of air the place out, and then we'll close it back up," Denney said.

Kitterman does unannounced inspections of Riley County and Manhattan restaurants, and usually does follow-up inspections to make sure the restaurants have taken care of the previously noted violations. Most Aggieville restaurants, Kitterman said, require follow-up inspections. He also does inspections in response to complaints from customers. The health department can fine restaurants and close them if they have continuing violations.

Food safety and cleanliness are two separate issues, Kitterman said.

"The cleanest place in the world could have violations that directly affect food safety and have nothing to do with cleanliness," he said. "I'm more concerned that if they hold the food at an improper temperature, it's going to grow bacteria and somebody may become ill, than whether they mop the floor properly or not."

▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board asks all area restaurants for cooperation with health-code regulations. See Page 4.

Kitterman said he pays close attention to food temperatures, including foods, such as cheese and sour cream, and raw and cooked meats, sitting out on holding tables.

"You'll see a lot of food-temperature violations on my inspections because I check that real close," Kitterman said. "That's something the customer really can't monitor, but I can."

Restaurants are supposed to spot check their temperatures to make sure they are at the required levels. On one inspection, Kitterman said he checked the temperature of chicken breasts that

Player pleads guilty, spends 2 days in jail

▶ VASILJEVIC'S LOSES SCHOLARSHIP AFTER DRUG-RELATED ARREST.

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Pero Vasiljevic, a freshman forward on the K-State men's basketball team, no longer has any means to stay in Manhattan, or even America.

Vasiljevic will return to Australia after serving two days in Riley County Jail. He pleaded guilty to possession of drug paraphernalia and obstruction of the legal process on Friday afternoon in Riley County District Court.

VASILJEVIC

The primary charge, possession of marijuana, was dismissed as part of Vasiljevic's plea agreement.

Vasiljevic was arrested for the three charges at 4:04 a.m. Tuesday. He had called police to an off-campus apartment, claiming someone was trying to break in.

Officers left after finding no one, but came back an hour later after Vasiljevic called again. They searched the apartment and found a pipe containing what later proved to be marijuana residue.

Barry Wilkerson, assistant Riley County district attorney, told Judge David L. Stutzman that Vasiljevic told officers he owned the pipe, but then repeatedly backed away from them when they tried to put him in handcuffs. It took repeated attempts to get Vasiljevic in the squad car, Wilkerson said.

Vasiljevic only was scheduled to be arraigned Friday, but Stutzman agreed to sentence him after the guilty pleas were entered. Stutzman said he had been told Vasiljevic's basketball scholarship had been

Judge to sentence Kaczynski today; 4 life terms likely ▶ UNABOMBER FACES SENTENCING FOR 18-YEAR BOMBING CAMPAIGN.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Stripped of his Unabomber mask, Theodore Kaczynski faces sentencing today, not as a crusading, anti-technology environmentalist but as an embittered, unbalanced revenge killer.

Under a plea bargain hammered out on the eve of opening statements in January, a federal judge is scheduled to sentence the 55-year-old former math professor to four life terms in prison plus 30 years for killing three men and maiming two others.

Kaczynski is expected to be sent to a high-security federal prison, defense attorney Quin Denvir said.

A half-dozen of his victims or their family members are prepared to address U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. in the hope of bringing some closure to the losses they suffered.

Whether Kaczynski will speak, not even his own attorneys can say.

"I don't know what he'll do," Denvir said. "I think it's unlikely, but with him, you never know."

Kaczynski's 18-year bombing campaign changed the way Americans mail packages and board airplanes,

Hole-in-one chip shot comes up short in golfer's attempt at $1 million prize

Mike Crawford of Manhattan placed his chance at $1 million six feet from the hole Sunday.

Crawford was the closest to the pin out of the 10 finalists competing in the Million Dollar Hole-in-One contest at Wildcat Creek Sports Complex. The contest raised $12,000 for the Riley County United Way.

But Crawford didn't walk away empty-handed. He won a new 35-inch color television and four tickets to Worlds of Fun for his efforts on the golf course.

"I look at it like this — I was six feet from retiring," Crawford said, "but I also was six feet from handing half of that over to Uncle Sam."

Crawford said he has labored for 10 years to learn the game of golf. He attempted to qualify for the event four times and did so on his last try.

"This is the first time I have ever won anything in golf," he said. "I guess my practice paid off.

"I told my friends that I would share the million with them if I won, but I hope they don't think that they're getting half my TV," he said.

About 80 golfers competed in Sunday's semifinals before the field was narrowed to the final 10.

Organizers said the 10-day contest attracted nearly 200 golfers each day who wanted a spot in the final round — and a chance at the $1 million grand prize.

Jason Taylor, freshman in business and a member of K-State's men's golf team, was one of the 10 finalists.

"I qualified a couple of times," Taylor said. "I didn't really think that I had much of a chance for the million dollars, but it was fun. I ended up shanking my last shot, but it was all good. I had fun, and it was for a good cause."

Event Coordinator Toby Adcock said there are about 70 events like the Riley County contest around the country. He said the contest is one of the best in the country at raising money for charity.

"We have raised a little more than $12,000 this year," he said. "The Manhattan people really came out and supported the event, even in the cold and rain."

Adcock said it's rare that someone wins the $1 million prize, but he has seen it happen three times.

"A couple of years ago, some card-carrying pros came out at one of our events and placed their shots right in the cup," he said. "Then the insurance company that we have a contract with said no more pros, and I haven't seen any hole-in-ones since."

Four men arrested in Lawrence brawl; police block street for more than 1 hour

LAWRENCE — A night of partying at a downtown club spilled into fighting in the street early Sunday, and it took police more than an hour to break it up.

Four men were arrested on misdemeanor charges stemming from the fights, Lawrence Police Sgt. Susan Hadl said.

Two men were arrested on charges of disorderly conduct, one was arrested on charges of disorderly conduct and criminal damage, and the fourth was arrested on charges of disorderly conduct and assaulting a law enforcement officer.

There were no serious injuries, she said.

More than 200 people were believed to be involved in the early morning disturbance that blocked part of Massachusetts Street, the main street through downtown.

It started at about 2 a.m. outside The Varsity, an old theater now rented to groups for private parties and events.

Police said they believed the fighting broke out when a group of people attacked one individual, and the melee escalated from there.

The original victim couldn't be found after the group had dispersed, Hadl said.

Parties near 3 college campuses conclude with property destruction, injured police

PULLMAN, Wash. — Police using tear gas and water hoses confronted rock-throwing partygoers early Sunday near the Washington State University campus. Three people were arrested, and 23 police officers were injured.

The disturbance started when police went to investigate a car-pedestrian accident and encountered as many as 200 people at a rental house in the neighborhood.

Authorities said they were unsure what prompted the violence, in which beer cans and rocks were thrown at the officers.

"It was a spontaneous event at a party house," city Police Chief Ted Weatherly said.

Pieces of furniture were set afire in the street. Damage included broken store windows and car windshields.

Most of the injured officers were treated for insignificant cuts and bruises and were released, university spokeswoman Barbara Petura said. One officer suffered a broken ankle. Four students were treated for insignificant injuries and released.

Weatherly said more arrests were possible after police reviewed photographs and videotapes of the disturbance.

On Saturday, police in East Lansing, Mich., fired tear gas into a crowd of 3,000 Michigan State University students who lit a bonfire in the city's downtown to protest a ban on drinking at a favorite party spot.

Demonstrators were angry the university decided to put a stop to drinking at Munn Field, a campus spot where fans have parties before and after Spartan football games.

The confrontation came a few hours before the release of a national study that said the school leads the nation's universities in alcohol-related arrests.

Also Saturday, police in New Hampshire were pelted with bottles, beer cans and rocks when they tried to disperse more than 500 partying Plymouth State College students and visitors.

It took about 80 officers from throughout New Hampshire to bring under control a crowd of hundreds of students at an annual off-campus fraternity party.

Building for the Future

▶CARE CENTER TO ADD SPEECH, HEARING CLINIC FOR INFANTS, CHILDREN.

Groundbreaking ceremonies were Saturday for a $1.5 million expansion and renovation of the Ruth Hoeflin Stone House Child Care Center, which will add new services to the center, including a speech and hearing clinic. The event also marked the 20th anniversary of the child-care center and the 125th anniversary of the College of Human Ecology.

The finished building will be named the C.Q. and Georgia Chandler Institute for Child and Family Studies. The Chandlers, both K-State graduates from Wichita, are the largest contributors to the expansion project. Georgia Chandler has ties to K-State's early childhood education program that date back to when she was enrolled in nursery school at nearly 3 years old, while her mother attended summer classes.

"In some ways it's a sentimental journey for my husband and me," Georgia Chandler said.

"Fifty years ago this fall, we were newlyweds, and I taught in the college nursery," she said.

"I was only there for one semester, because my husband graduated then in January, but it's always been very dear to our hearts."

The 14,000-square-foot institute will house the expanded Ruth Hoeflin Stone House Child Care Center and the Louis W. and Dolpha Baehr Speech and Hearing Clinic.

Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, said she was grateful to the K-State alumni who have contributed funds.

"This addition will make it possible for the college to expand its programs to include infants, as well as children up to age 8, which is important to the certification of early childhood education teachers," Stowe said.

"In addition to that, another part of the building will provide clinical facilities for the communication sciences and disorders program that has joined the College of Human Ecology in the past four years. They were in great need of clinical facilities, and this will provide for that program," she said.

Stone House currently has toddler and preschool programs. The expansion will add a program for infants and a kindergarten program.

John Murray, director of the School of Family Studies and Human Services, said the kindergarten will be significant, because teachers in the early childhood education system are now being taught to certify them from birth to age 8.

"We will now have the facilities to have that kind of experience for early childhood education students," Murray said.

Murray said the lower level of the institute will include a laboratory and diagnostic center for speech and hearing.

The communication sciences and disorders program's move to the new building, he said, will facilitate a connection between child language and early childhood education.

"The institute will be a place where we'll be doing a lot of outreach with children with special needs," Murray said.

"Stone House is not really set up to handle kids with special needs."

Built in the 1860s, Stone House first was known as the Black Walnut house, because it sat in a grove of black walnut trees on land owned by Capt. Ephraim Keats of New Hampshire. Samuel Williston, a blacksmith from Boston, acquired the property from Keats, and he and his wife raised their 10 children there, while some of them attended K-State.

Their son, Samuel Williston Jr., was the founding dean of the University of Kansas Medical School.

In 1905, the Willistons sold their house to John and Fannie Gish, who lived there with their eight children for 20 years.

Mildred Gish, daughter-in-law of the Gishes, attended the groundbreaking ceremony.

Stone House was sold to K-State in 1925. From the late 1920s until the 1940s, poultry-science students lived in the house and tended the chicken coops behind it.

In the mid-1970s, Stone House was chosen as the future site of a child-care center.

Ruth Hoeflin, dean of the former College of Home Economics, helped oversee the renovation.

The first toddler and preschool programs at Stone House were opened in 1977. Louellen West, program director of the Ruth Hoeflin Stone House Child Care Center, has been there since its inception. West said she will integrate the construction into her teaching.

"With preschool children, everything is a learning experience anyway," she said. "That's the way we approach life. We'll talk about why they're digging a big hole here, and what a basement is."

Construction will begin this summer, and Murray said he hoped the institute would be completed in fall 1999.

"The nice part about this is that it will still be of residential character," he said.

OURview

Our View, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. Our View is the Collegian's official opinion.

Compliance with health codes takes more effort

Today, articles in the Collegian report on health-code violations at Aggieville restaurants. These articles were written, edited and printed for the same reason many articles are — informed readers make better individuals, and in this case, better consumers.

While these articles discuss the problems in Aggieville restaurants, this editorial will discuss how restaurant owners, employees and even customers can help solve these problems.

There is a high turnover of restaurants in college towns such as ours. Students might work at a restaurant for a few months or maybe a year, but often leave sooner than they would have otherwise because they graduate, have too much class work or for any number of other reasons.

This high turnover makes good training all the more important.

Though it is somewhat expensive and time consuming, restaurant owners should make a better effort to train their employees so they follow health-codes rules. After all, these rules are in place to ensure the public's health, not to destroy the profitability of small businesses.

Starting a restaurant takes hard work and money — more than just a good idea and a catchy slogan. Restaurant owners should take pride in the hard work they do, and when violations occur, they should be rectified as soon as possible. Those violations should not happen again.

Restaurant owners should take their customers' health seriously. Customers deserve a clean place to eat.

Some restaurants corrected violations between the first and second inspections, and those restaurants should be commended for their hard work.

To those reading who are patrons of these restaurants: If you see violations occur, don't sweep them under the carpet and ignore them.

The health of your friends, neighbors and family could be at stake.

Butter & basketball

Graduate-to-be reveals wish list for K-State

VIEWPOINT

Lisa Dethloff
Lisa is a senior in political science. You can send e-mail to Lisa at batman@ksu.edu.

Well, the job is almost done. I have exactly 12 days until graduation, and then life will be absolutely wonderful. But as with most graduates, I have been looking back and wondering what would have made my college career better.

The most important thing I could have done was to have studied more and played less, but then the true college experience never would have evolved. Here are a few things:

Wish #1 — I wish Union Stateroom cafeteria would not feel obligated to charge for the little squares of butter. I am a big fan of their biscuits and fan loaves, but I refuse to pay another nickel for butter. Butter should be one of those free condiments. When I come back as an alumna and want to eat a cheeseburger, it probably will cost me a quarter for each pump of ketchup.

Wish #2 — I wish K-State would return to its original seal that states, "Kansas State University of Agriculture and Applied Sciences." I believe the university should embrace promoting our agricultural heritage instead of ignoring our roots and accepting the "bastard seal," particularly because we are one of the original land-grant universities.

Wish #3 — Why can't the men's basketball team grant me the wish of actually beating KU in Manhattan? I go to the games, cheer until the point of exhaustion, and we still never win. Then to add to this humiliation, I have to go and face my aunt and uncle who are the epitome of obsessed Jayhawks. Just once I would like to go home at Easter and have bragging rights about total Wildcat athletic domination. But no, I must sit in the corner and eat my ham alone.

Wish #4 — I wish Waters 41 was actually a pretty room with decent air conditioning. For those of you who are not political science majors, this is the room that received wonderful press when the deer crashed through the window. Anyway, 99 percent of my classes are in this room, and all I can say is the environment does not inspire me to learn. The walls are drab, the lighting makes that annoying humming sound, and the only view the windows provide is of the smokers puffing away their lives with their "cancer sticks."

Wish #5 — I wish the university would require all students to purchase a Franklin Planner to organize their lives and just look cool. I did not learn this important lesson until I met my dear friends Jennafer, Jake and Gabe, and they showed me the light. I know because of them and their guidance I am a better person.

Wish #6 — I wish Student Publications and the Student Governing Association actually would try to be civil to each other. However, the "power of the pen" and the "power of the purse" are constantly at war. It would be nice to have a student newspaper that supports the people in student government and a student government that accepts the role of the student newspaper.

Wish #7 — I wish "Greek-letter frats" would model themselves after the excellence of the FarmHouse fraternity. FarmHouse has had the oldest alcohol-free house policy on campus since 1921, and the Farmers are just good guys. Plus, my place of employment, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, is named after a FarmHouse alumnus, so it has to be an awesome fraternity.

Wish #8 — I wish everyone would have the tremendous K-State education I had and the lifelong friends who have made my past four years here memorable. I wish everyone happiness as they move to different places and take on new opportunities. Plus, I wish everyone to have a comfortable couch for when I come to visit. Watch out, Casey, I will be in Boston soon to visit.

Happy graduation! Have a great summer!

Summer newlyweds might want to wait before they procreate

VIEWPOINT

Jason Rucker
Jason is a senior in animal science. You can send e-mail to Jason at anubis@ksu.edu.

With the upcoming arrival of summer break, the wedding frenzy begins. If you're an upperclassman, half the people you know probably are getting married this summer, or are working feverishly to put one together. While marriage is scary, what often follows is terrifying — children.

After much observation and 22 years spent as a child, I've come to a few conclusions.

First and foremost, children are inherently evil little creatures.

Many people would disagree with this statement. But, in most cases of crimes committed by youths, what is the leading explanation for their actions? Poor parenting, or lack thereof.

Without parents, children are greedy and destructive. If you don't believe me, watch two small children at a park sometime. They'll beat each other to death over who gets which swing if you let them.

As soon as they can control their limbs, children can and will destroy everything they can get their hands and/or mouths on. Put a small child in a room with an M-1 Abrams tank and turn your back for 30 seconds. When you look back you'll find the entire thing disassembled and glistening with a fine coat of saliva.

A prime example of this is my cousin, Adam, who wrecked the family car at the age of 2. My aunt left him in the car while she ran up to her neighbor's door. The next thing she knew, the car was rolling for the ditch. They got him out and all he would say was, "Car go boom! Car go boom!"

Time passes, and the children become more proactive in their schemes. I was a lifeguard for three years, and I saw plenty of malicious behavior accompanied by alibis only a mother would fall for. The sad part is there is an inverse relationship between how demonic a child is and how willing to accept it the child's parents are.

Young Damian has sprouted horns and is prancing about the neighborhood kicking dogs and breaking windows, while his parents grow ever more certain he is destined for sainthood.

This "angel" complex parents tend to develop in the way they see their children (particularly for the only or youngest child) is recognized, and just as swiftly put to use by the child.

We all knew at least one Eddie Haskell who could schmooze his way into and out of anything. He had the innocent face and the puppy-dog eyes that could draw any desired response from his folks. Some of these young weasels even could turn on the tears if need be.

These were the children whose parents were positive their little babies had been born with golden halos floating above their heads.

While this would be convenient for obstetricians in need of something to grip during delivery, I have a feeling it would be uncomfortable for the mother. No child is born with a halo, and yours won't be either. As the parents of the next generation we have to be willing to accept this.

I realize it is easier said than done, and there are a lot of good children out there. However, too many parents make it far too easy for their children to manipulate them. If your little angel has grown a spade-tipped tail and bat wings, open your eyes and notice it. If you find yourself wondering why everyone seems to be out to get your little one, perhaps it isn't everyone else who has the problem.

Through continued denial of your children's misbehavior, and your defense of them, they only learn they can get away with anything. Unfortunately, it seems as though this is only obvious from outside the situation.

I am not a parent, and far from an expert on the subject. But I have observed many parents who defend or deny their child's unacceptable behavior. This teaches children they need not be responsible for their actions, and as they grow older their actions grow more dangerous to themselves and others.

Let's at least put forth the effort to instill in our children a sense of responsibility for their actions at an early age. They will carry this sense of responsibility with them throughout their lives, and the world only can be a better place for it.

Sackett exaggerates his own knowledge

Editor,

Sam Sackett is right in saying the problem of pollution is overblown, and he has done a little research on this subject. However, that does not mean the greenhouse effect can be discounted completely.

Sackett's right. A little extra carbon dioxide in the atmosphere is beneficial for plants. However, it still holds sunlight in the atmosphere and causes fluctuations in the weather. A prime example is the 1815 explosion of Tambora, a volcano in Indonesia. The carbon this eruption placed in the atmosphere produced "the year without a summer," during which crops in New England and Europe were wiped out by July frosts.

Besides the carbon dioxide added to the atmosphere by human pollution (not to mention other poisons such as carbon monoxide, which are not beneficial to plants and dangerous to humans), a significant problem is caused by the destruction of the rain forests, which largely is responsible for sucking up all the CO_2 that provides their "fuel."

Without enough plants to remove the carbon, it remains in the atmosphere and increases the temperature. Could this really happen? Venus, whose temperature of 800 degrees is a direct result of what we might call an overabundance of pollution, is an excellent and sobering example.

No, Sackett, we cannot destroy the planet. Nothing short of an act of God can do that. But we certainly can make it extremely uncomfortable for a few years. There are certainly more important environmental problems to worry about, chief among them overpopulation. However, the greenhouse effect is still an important danger of which we must be aware.

Temperatures are rising around the globe, and there are still things we can do to stave off the problem. Pollution is neither "invented," nor trivial.

Jennifer Burdoo
sophomore undecided

Research might give Sackett credibility

Editor,

I admit I was overly optimistic when Kevin Bailey quit writing a weekly Collegian column. I understand there is probably an audience out there for that brand of drivel, but I hoped the Collegian wouldn't pander to them anymore. But that hope was dashed after I read a few of Sam Sackett's columns. I bit my tongue for a while, but finally had to write after Friday's effort.

Sackett openly admits his ignorance: "I don't claim to understand even a small portion of the details surrounding ozone depletion and holes in the ozone."

He then proceeds to tell us global warming is a giant hoax, and the vast majority of scientists don't believe we should be doing anything, because this is not a problem at all. That is most assuredly untrue.

All I can say is, because Sackett is a freshman, I only hope that during his next three years at K-State, he learns some science and also learns that total ignorance about a topic is a pretty feeble basis for a newspaper column. He will have to do a lot better than that if he hopes to find a career in his major.

Rides would protect bystanders, drunks

Editor,

This is in response to Doug Eisenmann's letter "K-State not responsible for transporting drunks." Something he wrote bothered me. At the end of his comment, he stated if a person doesn't call a cab, have a friend pick them up, etc., then they deserve to get a DUI.

I pose this question: Does the innocent person who gets hit by the drunken driver deserve this? I do agree personal responsibility has to come into play when drinking, but the fact is some people drink and drive. Why not give these people a safer way to get home — not only safer for the individual drinking, but more importantly, safer for the innocent bystander.

Just think — it could be your daughter, sister, mother or even you. Let's stop it before it happens.

Independents deserve coverage as athletes

Editor,

When I picked up the Collegian sports section Friday, I thought "Wow, the Collegian is finally writing an interesting article about K-State intramurals." I thought maybe some of the non-scholarship athletes would get some credit for a change. Boy, was I wrong.

This is the first time in four years I've ever seen an article about an individual intramural event. Maybe amateur opinions on pro sports are more newsworthy.

Earlier this year, more than 10 schools from Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska brought men and women to compete in the Association of College Unions International regional qualifying tournament. If this were a greek philanthropy football tournament, I'm sure it would have made the front page. Unfortunately, the "sports" were bowling and billiards, but I can assure you there were more future professional athletes in the K-State Student Union that weekend than at the average K-State football game.

I guess if one were to argue these aren't really sports, then intramural horseshoes certainly doesn't qualify either. After all, to bowl one is aiming at 10 pins instead of one stake. But when some space needs to be filled, who did the Collegian turn to? Greeks, of course. I'm sure Jacob Vogel and Sean Cowherd are good horseshoe players. However, what the article fails to mention is that last year's all-university champions are Thad Rhodes and myself — independents.

Aggieville restaurant inspections

All but one of the restaurants in Aggieville have been inspected at least twice by the health department in the last year. Eclipse Brew House was inspected once, not twice this year. Columns marked with "1st" and "2nd" refer to the first and second inspections, respectively. An "X" indicates a violation for the criteria listed.

Each year, the Food Service Sanitarian for the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department is contracted to do a number of inspections equal to twice the number of restaurants in Riley County. Although attempts are made to inspect each restaurant twice every year, sometimes time constraints prevent this.

Another factor that influences whether restaurants are inspected twice a year is the number of complaints the Health Department receives. When a complaint is received, the restaurant in question must be inspected, meaning some restaurants might be inspected more times in one year than other restaurants. It could also mean some restaurants might not be inspected all, although it is unlikely that this would happen.

Criteria include the following:

Vermin: Roaches, roach casings, roach eggs, mouse droppings and/or flies were present.

Food temperatures: Hot foods were not cooked to proper temperature, and/or cooked foods and cold foods were not kept at the proper temperatures and/or raw meats were not thawed properly.

Personal drinks in food prep areas: Employees had personal drinks in food-preparation areas, causing the danger of possible cross-contamination from spillage or handling.

Hand sink obstructed, no soap or towels: Hand sinks did not have soap, paper towels and/or were not free of obstruction so employees could wash their hands properly.

Improper chemical storage: Containers such as spray bottles were not labeled and/or chemicals, including soap, were stored near food or clean utensils.

Improper sanitizing of rags, dishes: Rags and sponges were not rinsed and stored in a sanitizing mixture between uses, and/or dishes were not sanitized properly.

Dirty equipment: Equipment, including mixers, display cases, shelves, coolers and floors were not cleaned properly.

Outside door violations: There were significant gaps around doors that increased the possibility of mice or flies entering the restaurant and/or open outside doors allowed flies to enter.

Hand washing: Employees did not wash their hands after touching surfaces such as their face, hair, cash register, dirty dishes, raw meats or trash, and/or did not dry their hands on disposable towels, rather than cloth towels or aprons.

Items stored on floor: Items such as food, utensils and dishes were stored on the floor.

Restaurant owners need to train their employees, sanitarian says

▶ COMPLAINTS PREVENT FURTHER HEALTH RISKS BY ALERTING OFFICIALS.

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

Restaurant complaints called into the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department, which average three to four each month, most commonly are due to suspected food-borne illnesses, roaches and poor hygiene practices.

Joe Kitterman, Food Service Sanitarian for the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department, said restaurant employees touching their faces and their hair and not washing their hands before touching a customer's food is a common complaint.

"I get a lot of complaints about just actual hand contact with people's food," Kitterman said. "For instance, if you go in Mr. Goodcents or Subway or any of the sandwich shops where they prepare the food right in front of you, a lot of people get upset that people are touching their food, but that's perfectly OK, as long as they're washing their hands before they're touching the food," he said.

Restaurants such as sandwich shops, he said, usually have a small sink right behind them for hand washing.

"If you don't see them wash their hands before they handle your food, then you ought to complain," he said.

Kitterman also said employees who wear latex gloves should take their gloves off and throw them away if they have touched their face, hair or money.

"They think gloves somehow become protection against everything, but they can get dirty just like your hands," he said.

And because of possible pinholes, gloves should not be accepted by the employee as a fool-proof barrier.

"We teach people in food safety courses to wash their hands before they put the gloves on and when they take the gloves off," he said. "What gloves do that we like — even if hands aren't washed, is that unfortunately, there are certain people who don't wash their hands after going to the bathroom — and with gloves on, at least they're not spreading those types of diseases."

> "THEY THINK GLOVES SOMEHOW BECOME PROTECTION AGAINST EVERYTHING, BUT THEY GET DIRTY JUST LIKE YOUR HANDS."
> JOE KITTERMAN
> Food Service Sanitarian

Because of complaints, Kitterman said he knows customers pay attention to restaurant employees who are not washing their hands enough, but said people should be watching it more, because he sees many of those types of violations.

"If the cooks have dirty aprons with hand prints all over them, they're obviously not washing their hands, they're just wiping the food on the aprons, which is not allowed," he said.

Another requirement of hand washing by a restaurant employee is that hands are dried on disposable towels.

"You're never allowed to wipe your hands on any cloth, because cloths get reused, they get contaminated, and then each time you wipe on them, you just spread more bacteria to your hands," he said. "There's no instance in the Kansas Food Service Establishment Regulations where you're allowed to dry your hands or wipe your hands on any cloth towel or apron. It has to be disposable. It's a method of cross-contamination, and it's just not allowed, but it's a hard habit to break people of."

One of the more common complaints Kitterman receives is customers seeing roaches in the restaurant, or sometimes in their food. Kitterman said it is possible to control roaches with the proper amount of effort and a good pest control operator.

"It takes some effort on the part of the restaurant to keep it clean, and it takes a quality pest control operator to use the chemicals properly to control the roaches," he said. "If you're seeing roaches in the dining room, they've got too many roaches."

Last year, Kitterman received complaints of possible food-borne illness more than any other kind of complaint. Kitterman said customers who might have gotten sick from food at a restaurant should call that restaurant to inform them of the illness. He also suggested being tested for food-borne illness in a physician's office. If the test is positive, it will be reported to the health department. Alternately, a customer can call Kitterman at the health department to report the illness.

Kitterman said customers should make allowances for busy times in restaurants and assume situations will be rectified after the rush is over.

"Complaints of food on the floor or unwiped tables that occur during the lunch hour or when restaurants are busy are unfounded, and customers can be expecting too much," he said.

"The people I want to call me in particular are the ones who feel like they got ill in a restaurant," Kitterman said.

He said if a customer finds a hair in the food, it is best handled by talking to the manager. He said he also suggests to customers if they see violations that annoy them to stop patronizing the restaurant.

"Just because they came and complained to me and I go to the restaurant and call it to the attention of the restaurant, as soon as I leave, they can go right back to doing it again."

Another approach Kitterman suggested is to call it to the attention of the manager, which he said not many people do.

"If you say, 'This is a problem, I'm not going to patronize this place if this is not corrected,' I think that probably makes more of an impact than me coming in," he said.

"If enough people do that, I think the message will get across."

had just come off the grill. He said none of the chicken breasts were cooked to more than 150 degrees, which is less than the required 165 degrees.

"You assume that raw chicken is contaminated, and it's very important to cook it at the proper temperature," he said.

The cook was cooking the chicken breasts to a certain color of brown, Kitterman said, and when Kitterman asked the cook if he ever checked the temperature, the cook said he wasn't even sure where the thermometer was.

Mike Robinson, co-manager of 12th Street Pub, said food temperature violations aren't uncommon to Manhattan restaurants, partly because of the way some of the equipment is designed.

"If you talk to Joe Kitterman, he's going to say that every restaurant in Manhattan has had a problem with this," Robinson said.

Robinson said 12th Street had corrected its problem with maintaining food temperatures by rearranging food items on its cooling table and moving foods, such as sour cream and cheese, into the middle of the table where the cooling fan is.

Kitterman said some food-safety violations are attributed to employees not being trained properly.

"There's no requirement that restaurants give their employees food-safety training," he said.

Last year the city of Manhattan passed an ordinance requiring one person from each restaurant to take a one-day, eight-hour food-safety training course and pass a certification test.

"The implication is that they'll use that training to help train other employees," Kitterman said. According to health department records, most Aggieville restaurants sent two employees to the food-safety training course.

During inspections last year, Kitterman observed cooks in two Aggieville restaurants — Hardee's and Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon — touching raw ground beef and not washing their hands before continuing to prepare other food. In one instance, the cook touched ready-to-eat food.

Rusty Wilson, owner of Chance, said the restaurant dismissed the cook Kitterman observed who didn't use a thermometer.

"The cooks are all trained to have to wear rubber gloves to touch any type of raw food items, and that person's no longer here," Wilson said. "I remember that specific incident, and that was corrected immediately."

A spokesperson for Hardee's would not comment on its incident.

Kitterman said he is concerned mainly with food temperatures, hand washing and sanitizing equipment when he does his inspections.

"Clean doesn't necessarily mean sanitary," he said. "If the place is absolutely filthy, yes, I'm going to call that to their attention."

Morrow signs with K-State

K-State women's golf coach Kristi Knight announced the signing of Texas high school senior Annie Morrow (Southlake Carroll High School).

Morrow has been a standout on her high school golf team. She recently qualified for the Texas High School Regional Tournament.

Knight said Morrow has a bright future at K-State.

"I am excited about Annie's potential," Knight said. "She has won a couple tournaments this year and isn't anywhere close to peaking. She has only been playing competitive golf for a couple years. She has been a championship swimmer and track athlete in high school, is a good student and has a good work ethic. She will be a great addition to our team."

Morrow earned letters in swimming, basketball, track and golf. Morrow also was the editor of her high school newspaper in 1997 and made the 1997 Who's Who Among High School Students list.

Yankees wallop Royals 10-1

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Even 10-1 routs have turning points.

For the New York Yankees, it came in the sixth inning Sunday against Kansas City.

With Darryl Strawberry on third and two outs, Scott Brosius grounded to rookie shortstop Felix Martinez, whose high throw to first drew Jeff King off the bag as Strawberry scored for a 4-1 lead.

An angry Tim Belcher, looking for his first victory since opening day, then gave up a bunt single to Homer Bush, hit Derek Jeter and forced in two runs with two walks.

That was that.

"If you give the Yankees an extra out an inning, the other team's in trouble," Chuck Knoblauch said. "They have a hard enough time with three outs. We put three good outs up every inning. If you give us an extra out or two, it might be a hard inning."

Given an extra out, baseball's hottest team scored three runs with just one hit — a bunt single at that.

The Yankees (20-6) have won 19 of 21 for the first time since Aug. 14-Sept. 4, 1977, and are off to their best start since the 1958 team won 20 of its first 25.

"It's been an incredible run so far," said David Cone, who pitches at Texas on Tuesday night following today's off day. "It's been somebody different every night, although Tino Martinez has been our MVP up to this point. And the bullpen has been incredibly solid, almost automatic at times."

It's been easy for manager Joe Torre.

"There's very little you do with this team," he said. "You work in spring training, you give them an approach you want to take, and you let them do it. There are a number of veterans on this club. They know what to do."

Ramiro Mendoza (1-1), the only Yankees starter to lose in the past three weeks, allowed three hits in seven innings, giving up a sacrifice fly to King in the fourth.

Belcher (1-4), winless in six starts, gave up six runs and eight hits in six innings.

"I think the error by Felix was the turning point," Royals manager Tony Muser said. "That error let the air out of our bags a little bit. Any pitcher who's working hard is going to be a little disappointed by that."

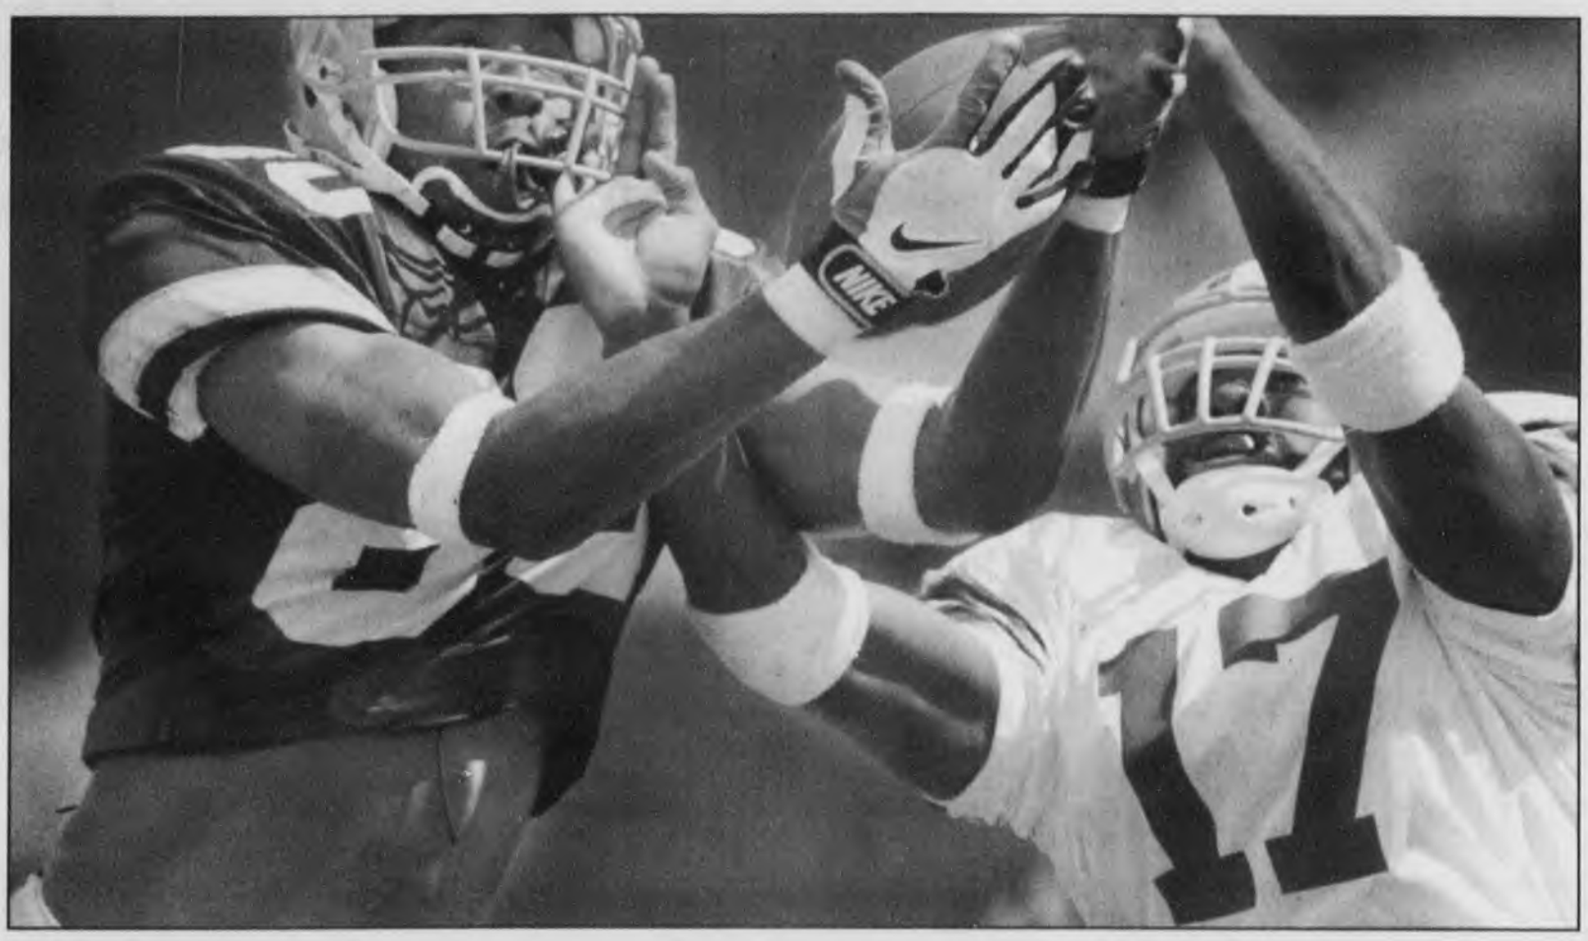
Jorge Posada, Paul O'Neill and Derek Jeter each had two RBIs, and Brosius had three hits and scored twice.

New York got a run in the first with the help of an error by King at first, Posada hit his fourth homer in the fourth and O'Neill made it 3-1 in the fifth with his 200th career homer, his first since last Sept. 28.

New York added four runs in the seventh off Jose Rosado on RBI singles by Posada and Brosius and a two-run single by Jeter.

Nebraska wins softball title

OKLAHOMA CITY — Ali Viola and Jenny Smith hit homeruns as Nebraska defeated the Sooners 3-0 to capture the Big 12 Conference softball championship on Sunday.



Viola's homer in the first inning provided the Cornhuskers all the scoring they would need to win, so Smith's two-run homer in the fourth inning was icing on the cake.

"A home run in the first inning was a nice way to begin a championship game," Nebraska coach Rhonda Revelle said afterward. "OU is a scary team to face. Their stats show they never say die. They kept coming at us (until) the very end today."

The Cornhuskers (44-10) got five hits and three runs off Sooner pitcher Sophia Contreraz (9-2).

When Lana Moran relieved her in the fourth inning, Moran held Nebraska scoreless in three innings, but the Sooners (47-13) could only get three hits off Voss, the tournament's most valuable player.

Both teams are expected to see action in the NCAA postseason.

Spring game features 1st half defensive show

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

In a situation like the Wildcats' Spring Game, playbooks are limited to about 20 percent and defenses are kept on short chains.

The true battle on the field wasn't ones vs. twos or purple vs. white — it was Wildcat offense vs. Wildcat defense.

"We don't look at it that way," defensive coordinator Mike Stoops said. "We just look at it from the standpoint that it's an opportunity to improve."

Neither team scored until the last three minutes of the first half — good defense. Two offenses then lit up the defenses for eight touchdowns. So whose side of the ball was more effective?

Both Stoops and offensive coordinator Ron Hudson were hesitant to make that call.

"I'm just glad we don't have to play our quarterback," Stoops said. "He's made a lot of strides. He's three times the quarterback he was when he got here, maybe more."

Hudson said quarterback Michael Bishop is learning that patience is actually a virtue.

"Developmentally with Michael, he's a young man who's starting to learn you have to be focused and not try to make something happen all the time," Hudson said. "He threw an interception at the end of the first half trying to force something."

Hudson said the late-quarter interception pass to defensive back Dyshod Carter was a mistake Hudson might have been able to prevent.

"The quarterbacks were calling their own plays the whole game," Hudson said. "But I called the dang thing that time. It was a three-level route, but one we just put in the other day. The kid forced it in there."

Those types of mistakes, along with numerous fumbles and penalties, will be things Hudson said the offense has to work to eliminate.

"It was typical spring ball," Hudson said. "The fact that we had so many penalties and fumbled the ball, what, four times? But we did get the ball up the field several times. At least we got a tempo going."

Stoops said the ball got up the field a little too easily for his liking on one play.

"It was a little disconcerting to see the tight end run all the way up the field with no one covering him," Stoops said. "Hopefully, we won't make those kinds of mistakes during the season."

Although Stoops said the team is more mature at every position because a majority of the starters returned on both sides of the ball, he said he was pleased with the newer players' performances.

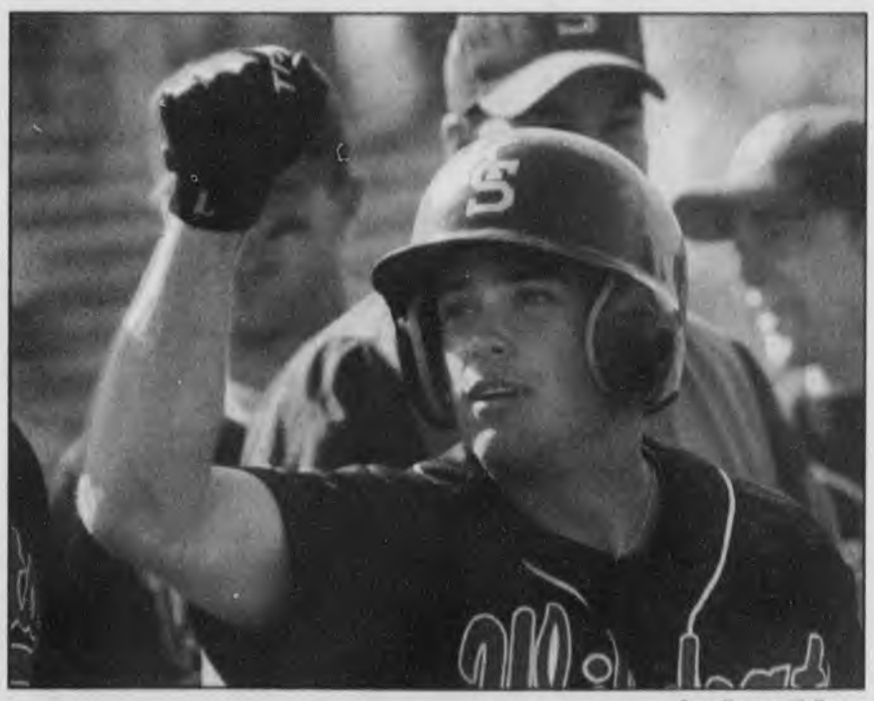
"We played a lot of young kids today," Stoops said. "I was pleased with DeAndrea Robinson, Da'Von Brame, Milton Proctor, Ben Leber, Monty Beisel and Melvin Williams. They're a lot of young kids with the potential to be great football players."

Leber stepped in for middle linebacker Jeff Kelly, and defensive end Travis Litton tried outside linebacker Travis Ochs' position on for size. Ochs has been sidelined for the spring due to off-season shoulder surgery.

"Litton did a good job today," Stoops said. "It's obviously good for Travis to get reps, but you don't realize all the little things that Travis Ochs does for you when he's out there, until he's not."

Beisel said this was the first practice the defense was allowed even to touch the quarterbacks. He recorded two sacks for minus-17 yards.

"Tackles we didn't lay off at all, because some of them outweigh us by 100 pounds," Beisel said. "But the quarterbacks we were easier on, especially Michael Bishop, since we'll need him next year."



Players on both sides of the ball said the game was so watered down it was boring, but they did what they could to make it more exciting for themselves and the fans.

"It's kind of boring when you know what they're going to do," wide receiver Darnell McDonald said. "We were trying to make it fun, talking some smack out there, but it's still kind of boring."

Even head coach Bill Snyder said he had to stifle a few yawns.

"Wasn't that boring?" Snyder asked reporters after the game. "I was bored to death. I couldn't wait to get out of there."

Cats drop 2 to KU, eliminated from conference tournament

K-STATE SECOND BASEMAN CHAD TABOR CELEBRATES WITH HIS TEAMMATES AFTER HIS FIFTH-INNING HOME RUN TO TIE SATURDAY'S GAME 2-2. THE CATS WENT ON TO LOSE THE GAME 5-2 IN THE 10TH INNING.

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State baseball team was eliminated from the Big 12 Conference Tournament after a 5-2 loss to KU in 10 innings Saturday afternoon at Frank Myers Field.

With two out and the score tied 2-2 in the top of the 10th, KU first baseman Randy Case smacked a three-run hit to right field off Wildcat reliever Andy Silva to put the Jayhawks on top 5-2.

Silva hit his 15th double of the season in the bottom of the inning, but it wasn't enough as K-State left two men on base.

KU starter Rusty Philbrick struck out 12 and gave up four hits while pitching a complete game, upping his record to 3-3 on the year. Starter Chris Traylor went toe-to-toe with Philbrick for 9 2/3 innings, scattering eight hits, giving up four runs and striking out seven. Traylor's record dropped to 2-6 on the year.

K-State also dropped a 9-7 decision to KU on Friday night. Starter Brandon Peck suffered the loss, dropping his record to 4-4 on the year.

"I don't think we were focused enough," third baseman Josh Marn said of the series. "I think we beat ourselves."

> "I DON'T THINK WE WERE FOCUSED ENOUGH. I THINK WE BEAT OURSELVES."
> JOSH MARN
> K-STATE THIRD BASEMAN

K-State coach Mike Clark said the team suffered because it had to practice inside at Brandeberry Indoor Complex after playing outside for a good stint.

"The three days inside killed us," Clark said. "We had momentum from being outside so much. For two weeks, we were swinging the bats real good, and then you go inside and you lose everything — the tracking, the ball, the movement — everything."

The Cats won the rubber game of the series 2-1 on Sunday afternoon. In a brilliant pitching performance, Pat Hertzel went eight innings and gave up just five hits and one earned run while striking out seven. It was Hertzel's third win of the season and by far his best outing of the year.

"I just made pitches," Hertzel said of his execution. "Give credit to the catcher, though — he made all the calls."

K-State got its first run in the fourth inning. First baseman Chet Savage was hit by a pitch with two outs and scored on left fielder Kasey Weishaar's triple to left-center field.

One should not invite police into one's home when one has drugs, drug paraphernalia

VIEWPOINT

JESS LOUK

Jess is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Jess at jess31@ksu.edu

Did anybody hear that bell ring?

People across the Midwest and the nation have heard of Pero Vasiljevic's actions and are looking at our men's basketball program with severe disgust.

It's just another episode acted out by one of the few, which, once again, has reflected poorly on the entire team and university.

For example, Manny Dies was arrested last year, received probation and is awaiting trial on another arrest. Duane Davis has two DUIs since he has been here at K-State, and Vasiljevic — well, read on for a fictional account of Down Under's latest blunder.

Let's take an untrue walk through world of drug paraphernalia.

Picture yourself in the corner, watching smoke mingle with the black light, when your friend, a tall basketball player, begins to grow extremely paranoid.

Friend — Did you hear that? I heard a noise over by the closet! I think someone has infiltrated my apartment, mate. Quick! Call the cops!

You — Sit back down on the futon. You can't even see your hands, much less hear. I think you have had a bit too much. Maybe you should lay off for a while.

Friend — (eyes glazed and drool coming from his lips) No, I definitely am going to call the cops.

You — Later.

Note: While this is a completely fictional situation, any similarities to actual events are completely coincidental. Oh, and if something similar ever happens to you, I recommend not having drug paraphernalia lying around your apartment. Especially if you decide to invite cops over for a little open house.

As you began to gather your jacket and head for the door, your friend frantically is punching 537-2112 into his cordless phone.

Dispatcher — Good morning, Riley County Police Department, how may I help you?

Friend — (shouting into the phone) For the love of Bob Marley, get somebody over here now! I have an intruder. (his knuckles are white as he clutches the phone)

Dispatcher — Sir, are you in the apartment now?

Friend — Yeah, mate, I'm in the apartment. I'm not leaving until he does.

Dispatcher — (in a confused voice) He, who, sir?

Friend — What do you mean hee-hoo-hee-hoo? This is no time for "Hee Haw." I'm serious here. There is somebody in my apartment.

Dispatcher — Uh, OK, sir, why don't you leave the apartment and wait for our arrival.

At this point, you happen to be playing the hero of our little episode, and you just have invited the cops over to your house. You should:

A. Fix yourself some cereal, sit in the tub and sing Ernie's "Rubber Duckie."

B. Get any and all drugs, drug paraphernalia, liquor or anything illegal out of the house.

C. Open up a huge Foster's and fall asleep watching Cheech and Chong's "Up in Smoke."

D. Slap your roommate, Jerry Garcia, and call him Shirley.

For those of you who are mentally challenged, the answer is B.

But let's break away from this little farce.

It's tough to have sympathy for Vasiljevic. The man invited the cops into his home while he had drug paraphernalia out where they could find it. That is just not smart.

This world is hard, and you almost always are going pay for your stupidity.

Vasiljevic is paying a stiff penalty for pleading guilty to possession of drug paraphernalia and obstruction of legal process. Both are Class A nonperson misdemeanors, punishable by a year and or $2,500 apiece.

For a bad case of paranoia and an empty marijuana pipe, Vasiljevic lost his scholarship and is being forced back to Australia after serving 48 hours in Riley County Jail.

Had Vasiljevic been able to average 20 points a game instead of three points a game, it's possible his trial would have been postponed and he wouldn't have been immediately kicked off the team.

Recent history suggests that much. It is the classic double standard.

That is where the K-State men's basketball program has arrived today. It's unfortunate the actions of the few can affect the reputation of an entire program. How do you think our men's basketball program looks in the eyes of the region and nation?

Not good.

Like football coach Bill Snyder said, "You can't unring a bell."

Tournament hopes crash as Cats lose 2 of 3 to KU

The Cats added an insurance run in the fifth inning. Again with two outs, Silva doubled to left-center and scored on Marn's double to left center.

"Thank the Lord we got a couple of timely hits," Clark said. "Other than that, not much on the offense."

After Hertzel faced two batters in the ninth, Silva was called for the save. Silva hit KU catcher Josh Dimmick on the shoulder, as Dimmick showed bunt, to load the bases. Catcher Yancy Ayres tracked down the passed ball and flipped it to Silva coming home, who tagged the runner for the second out of the inning.

"I think you see the value of a Yancy Ayres even if he doesn't hit," Clark said. "There are several ways you can win ball games, and he helped us win that ball game with his defense. He was as big as any hitter we had up there."

Teachers unions vote to merge despite structural differences

ASSOCIATED PRESS AND STAFF REPORTS

The board of the National Education Association voted Saturday in Washington, D.C., to recommend that the full NEA assembly approve guidelines leading to a merger with the American Federation of Teachers.

Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education at K-State, said the merger will create a group with more power, increasing pressure on the organization.

The increased power will not come without opposition. Holen said the merger will make forces opposed to unions even stronger.

"It will increase the group of people who are in favor of union-type activities on the part of the teachers," he said.

The nation's two largest teachers unions had announced substantial progress toward a merger in January in a joint statement that laid out what a new three-million-member organization might look like.

That January preliminary agreement was reached by NEA and AFT negotiators after four years of stop-and-go talks and a framework for merger was worked out in February.

Approval of those "Principles of Unity" by delegates at their separate conventions this summer in New Orleans would commit the longtime rivals to unify, and officials would draw up a new constitution. Members of the two unions then would be asked to adopt the new constitution in a nationwide vote that could lead to an actual merger in 2002.

Saturday's NEA board vote to proceed with merger plans was 106-53, after a five-hour debate participated in by members from 44 states.

"Today's debate centered around how NEA members and their organization can best help children succeed," NEA President Bob Chase said. "In a new, united organization, we can stop wasting time and energy and pool our resources to help our kids, our schools and our country. Collective, focused action can bring real improvements to our schools."

Holen said he has been in favor of recent attempts by the NEA to become more interested in non-monetary issues — such as school improvement and reform — and is uncertain whether the AFT has the same influence and objectives.

There have been some stark differences between the two organizations' operating structures and internal politics, but by coming together they would create a massive new union.

Despite differences within each organization, Holen said the merger should occur without any significant obstacles. He said whether the merger is a positive step remains to be seen, but there will not be a huge immediate effect.

The unity items call for seven full-time national officers, a 30-member executive board and a council composed of hundreds of state and local leaders. Autonomy would be emphasized for state, local and regional bodies.

The 900,000-member AFT has been an active member of the AFL-CIO labor federation, while the 2.3-million-member NEA is not affiliated. The new organization would affiliate with the AFL-CIO at the national level and encourage — but not require — regional, state and local bodies to affiliate.

NASA shuttle lands with experiments

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Space shuttle Columbia and its crew returned to Earth on Sunday, ending two weeks of lab work that advanced brain research despite unexpected animal casualties. And the experiments were far from over.

Within an hour, the crew was hustled to medical tests that were expected to go on for days. Six of the seven astronauts left on stretchers; doctors wanted them reclining to preserve their weightless state.

At the same time, NASA rushed to unload the animals so scientists could begin dissecting the few dozen surviving baby rats, as well as the nearly 2,000 fish, snails, crickets and older rodents that flew on the shuttle.

It was a race against gravity: the sooner the astronauts and animals could be examined, the greater the likelihood of observing space-induced changes in the nervous system.

"I'm sitting here like a little kid with ants in my pants," said Gay Holstein, a Mount Sinai School of Medicine researcher whose rats flew on Columbia. "I can't wait to get going on my experiment."

To everyone's relief, Columbia landed right on time at the Kennedy Space Center, where nearly 200 researchers waited with scalpels.

Commander Richard Searfoss had only two functioning hydraulic power units for most of the hour-long descent. The cooling system for the third unit failed to work Saturday; Searfoss turned that unit on just minutes before touchdown so it would not overheat.

As soon as Columbia rolled to a safe stop, Mission Control congratulated the astronauts for "a historic mission that elevated neuroscience research to record heights."

Among the space firsts achieved during the 16-day Neurolab flight: first direct nerve recordings, first joint recording of sleep and breathing, first embalming of animals and first surgery on animals meant to survive.

"The data obtained are really a precious resource that will help us to unlock some of the mysteries of the brain," NASA program scientist Mary Anne Frey said.

Only the rodent researchers knew for sure what they were getting back.

The astronauts kept close watch on the 170 rodents that rocketed into orbit with them on April 17, especially when the baby rats started dying. The surrogate mother rats could not or would not nurse the young animals in space. Although 55 of the 96 baby rats died prematurely, researchers said they hoped they still could achieve their primary objectives.

Because the containers for the fish, snails and crickets were inaccessible aboard Columbia, the astronauts did not know how those animals fared in weightlessness.

A quick inspection after landing, however, revealed only 25 of 225 baby swordtail fish survived the mission, a much higher mortality rate than expected.

Although the number of surviving crickets was not known immediately — more than 1,500 flew — scientists gleefully counted and observed those that came back hopping.

The postflight dissection plan called for the surviving fish and crickets to be placed on ice and frozen to death, the snails to be doused in alcohol, and the rats to be decapitated or overdosed with anesthesia.

The big question, for the astronauts anyway, was whether they would return to space this summer and do it again. NASA said it will decide this week whether to repeat the Neurolab mission in August to fill the flight gap created by the anticipated delay in space station construction.

Judge to hand down sentence in Unabomber case today and at its height in July 1995, virtually shut down air travel on the West Coast.

In his Unabomber manifesto, Kaczynski claimed a moral high ground, justifying the attacks in the name of preserving humanity and nature from the relentless onslaught of technology and exploitation.

But the journals found by FBI investigators in his Montana mountain cabin instead revealed a cynical, apparently sexually confused killer who delighted in his bloody explosions and cared little for the outside world.

Environmentalist? Hardly.

"I believe in nothing," Kaczynski wrote. "I don't even believe in the cult of nature-worshipers or wilderness-worshipers. I am perfectly ready to litter in parts of the woods that are of no use to me — I often throw cans in logged-over areas ..."

His real reasons for killing were simple.

"My motive for doing what I am going to do is simply personal revenge," he wrote.

One journal entry spoke of Kaczynski's response when, in graduate school at the University of Michigan in 1966, he visited a psychiatrist to discuss the possibility of a sex-change operation.

Too ashamed to talk of his confused sex life, he left the meeting and wrote in his diary: "Why not really kill that psychiatrist and anyone else whom I hate."

Since his brother David's tip led to Kaczynski's arrest in April 1996, the family has claimed the writings were that of a paranoid schizophrenic, not a cold-blooded killer. In January a federal prison psychiatrist agreed, opening the way for prosecutors to drop their demand for the death sentence and allow the plea bargain.

Anthony Bisceglie, a lawyer who represented David Kaczynski, claims no victory in helping to save Ted Kaczynski from lethal injection.

"There were two possible endings to this story — one was sad and one was horrific. We aimed for the sad ending," Bisceglie said. "The upside is that there will be no more killing and that Dave was able to save one more life. The downside is that Ted was convicted but he was not cured. The delusions that led to his actions remain."

But prosecutors see not the sympathetic face of a mentally ill genius, but a killer cold enough to freeze the blood.

In court documents, they recounted the agonizing deaths of his victims and the bombings' horrific effects on the victims.

Vasiljevic to return to Australia after plea bargain revoked, and there was no reason to prolong the case with a trial.

"The defendant no longer has any means to stay in Manhattan," Stutzman said.

Brent Bargen, interim assistant basketball coach and academic adviser, was present in court and said Vasiljevic's mother would be sending her son an airplane ticket to return to Australia. Vasiljevic said his mother still was making arrangements, but the plan was to leave the country sometime today.

The charges of possession of drug paraphernalia are both Class A nonperson misdemeanors, each punishable by a year in jail and $2,500 in fines. Stutzman sentenced Vasiljevic to 48 hours in Riley County Jail and $102.50 in court costs.

He was released from jail at 5:45 p.m. Sunday.

"It is appropriate to bring it to a conclusion as soon as possible," Stutzman said.

Vasiljevic, a 6 foot 9 inch, 230-pound freshman from Adelaide, Australia, came to Simi Valley, Calif., as a high-school foreign exchange student.

He led Simi Valley High to a 17-9 record and was first-team all-state, named one of the top 200 recruits in the nation.

He averaged 3.1 points and 2.1 rebounds per game in a backup role while at K-State this season.

COMBINING THOUGHT WITH ACTION

COLLECTION OF THE ARTIST

TOP: "QUADRILATERAL ARENA," ACRYLIC, GEL AND MOLDING PASTE ON CANVAS OVER WOOD PANEL (1996-97).
LEFT: "UNMANIPULATED DIALOGUE," ACRYLIC AND MIXED MEDIA ON PAPER (1994).

Abstract paintings reveal artistic process

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Sigmund Freud once said, "Thought is action in rehearsal."

If the Austrian psychoanalyst was right, perhaps the Minnesota-based painter Clarence Morgan most clearly represents the use of thought in action in painting. For the artist's sweeping abstractions, devoid of conventional meaning and subject, represent only their physical selves: great globs of acrylic paint applied by squeegees and palette knives on a square canvas.

This way of working isn't so much en vogue in the contemporary art world anymore, as art with political or ironic motivations seems to gain more attention. "The Archaeology of the Edge," an exhibition of paintings by Morgan, is a show almost entirely concerned with art, process and artist, as opposed to art, message and meaning.

Not that Morgan's non-objectivity (his lack of concern with representing the real, material world) does not entice speculative reactions. Some paintings want to articulate either anger or peace, motion or stillness, or the passage of time. As curator Bill North writes in the accompanying catalog, "Everything the viewer needs to know is in the painting and exposed for all to see. As the artist has noted, there is 'no mystery about the how (only the why?).' As for 'the why?', that is between the artist and the work, and it is precisely the answer to this query for which Morgan is searching."

Morgan finds his "whys" lurking beneath the surface of his paintings. In "Nourishment," acrylic and gel on canvas over a 48-inch square wood panel (1998), black, white, red and gray implode and explode in a densely complex work. There is an underlying tension, both literally and figuratively, in Morgan's fluid, rugged working of paint that eventually could become an archival nightmare. A smaller 8-by-12 inch work like "Unmanipulated Dialogue," acrylic and mixed media on paper (1994), reveals some semblance of organic geometries recalling Willem de Kooning.

Art Review

Morgan clearly owes a great deal to earlier generations of artists, most notably the abstract expressionists and some non-objective abstractionists. Morgan's own concession of the selfishness of his work, in that it represents his own expressions and mind, is an abstract expressionist school of thought, akin to Jackson Pollock and the New York school. His allowance for the painting to spill actively over the edges of the canvas, invading space not normally associated with a painting, also suggests some link to Pollock.

His works' tendency to act as a record of process owes to the influence of other, less definable artists like Robert Ryman, whom curator North recognizes in the accompanying catalog. Morgan's a painter who paints paint? That's a mouthful. As Ryman has often said, "It's not a question of what to paint but how to paint."

Seen in this manner, Morgan's work is an "archaeology" of his process. With the edges of the paintings exposed, because most are sans frame, varying strata of colors are revealed, giving the viewer a record of how the painting began. In a work like "Ideas and Systems," acrylic and gel medium on canvas over a wood panel (1996), splashes of lava red spill over the sides, tensely and sensually over-lapping the edges. In some cases, as with this work, Morgan's paint can take the properties of an object.

▶ Exhibit info
"The Archaeology of the Edge," an exhibition of paintings by Clarence Morgan, is at the Mariana Kistler Beach Museum of Art until June 21.

As with most artists since World War II, Morgan does not fit into a system of stylistic classification. Anyway, abstract expressionism circa the 1950s isn't a style, rather a manner of working. Ever since, artists have added their own singular contribution to art by way of a hybridization of these various manners and contributions of others.

Which is what makes the Morgan show an important step for our museum and our local understanding of contemporary art. Museums are still much in the process of educating a public that has not accepted readily the abstract notions of painting that are represented by Morgan. As artists work without conventional notions of "schools" and "styles," it makes the curatorial and critical challenge all the more difficult.

The act of museum visitors trying to find a thing where no thing exists except the paint surely is frustrating. Paradoxically, a simple show of paintings about painting and process should be one of the more understandable notions of this century. But if there is anything to be gained from this experience, it is an ability to see differently. The modern movement, with its roots in the early 19th century, has given us this above all else: no longer is the two-dimensional canvas simply a means for representing the three-dimensional world.

However, one may want to ask not why Morgan paints, but why he chooses to paint the way he does. Post-modern art, which brought political messages back to art, was an almost anticipated reaction to modernism and the New York school — a normal cyclical point of art history. Why is there a need to paint within and partly beyond the philosophies of Pollock and Ryman again? To ask that question is to face squarely the confusing questions of the approaching millennium and find the answers in a dab of paint.

"ONE MAY WANT TO ASK NOT WHY MORGAN PAINTS, BUT WHY HE CHOOSES TO PAINT WHAT HE DOES."

Sonny Bono tribute show to include comedy, history

▶ FORMER WIFE, CHER, REMEMBERS BONO WITH HOURLONG TV SALUTE TO AIR ON CBS LATER THIS MONTH.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — In 1977, three years after their divorce, Sonny and Cher reunited in a reprise of their TV show. Now it's happening again, in a manner of speaking.

CBS-TV is airing "Sonny & Me: Cher Remembers," the star's tribute to her ex-husband and co-performer, Sonny Bono, who died in a Jan. 5 skiing accident.

"A lot of the show is really hysterical, a lot of fun," Cher said of the hour-long salute in which she is star and co-producer. It airs May 20, on her 52nd birthday.

It may sound a bit odd, but it makes sense when it involves a couple who led such improbable lives — Sonny, the pop singer turned Congressman and Cher the gawky kid turned sex symbol and Oscar-winning actress.

Cher was in London when Chastity Bono, their daughter, called with news of Bono's death at the Heavenly Ski Resort in the Sierra Nevada.

"Thank God I was in shock," Cher said. "Shock is highly underrated. I think that it helps you try to absorb what it is you're in shock for. There's something you can't process right away."

Why the TV tribute?

"After I got back from the funeral and had a couple of weeks to have everything settle in, I just thought it would be a great thing."

Cher approached her old network, CBS, and the reception was enthusiastic. TV special veteran Don Mischer came on as director and co-producer.

"Sonny and Me" won't, it seems, be too heavy on biography.

"Some of the information will be very quick," Cher said, "so that we can focus on some of the things that represent part of the history in an entertaining way."

The pair met in November 1962 when Salvatore Bono was a 27-year-old record promoter with an unhappy marriage and few prospects. Cherilyn Sarkisian was 16 and an aspiring singer.

Discovering they could make music together, they teamed as Caesar and Cleo. Soon they began producing hit records as Sonny and Cher, leading to "The Sonny and Cher Comedy Hour" in 1971 on CBS. It lasted until 1974, when the couple divorced.

"I just had to be a grownup, and he didn't want that," she said. "You can't keep someone 16 forever. It just doesn't work."

After scant success with solo TV series, they reunited for "The Sonny and Cher Show" in 1977. She considers that the first time they were equal partners. "Before then I did the singing, and Sonny did everything else." But the old chemistry wasn't there, and the show faded in one brief season.

Cher said she recalled little friction during their partnership. "We were both interested in doing the thing that we liked the most," she said.

"And thank God we didn't compete with one another. Also, I was the laziest one, the one with the least ambition.

"I still think of myself as a really lazy person who works a lot."

That may help explain her eclectic career.

After two minor films, she devoted herself to recordings and engagements that seemed to display more and more of her feminine form.

A decade later, Robert Altman gave her a chance to prove she could act in "Come Back to the Five and Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean." "Silkwood" brought an Academy nomination. "Moonstruck" earned her an Oscar as best actress of 1987.

Bono was an entertainer for 25 years, then a restaurateur and management consultant, and finally a Republican politician elected to Congress in 1994 representing Palm Springs.

"IT'S A TIME FOR THE WHOLE GREEK COMMUNITY TO COME TOGETHER AND DO SOMETHING FOR A GOOD CAUSE."

HEIDI MORITZ, MEMBER OF DELTA DELTA DELTA

Like sands through an hourglass, so went this year's "Derby Days of our Lives."

This philanthropic event, sponsored by the Sigma Chi fraternity, took place the latter half of last week, beginning with the kickoff party on Wednesday evening and ending with Derby Day on Saturday.

Jeff Lamott, co-chairman of the event and junior in business administration, said the purpose of the event was to raise money for the Children's Miracle Network.

"Our goal is to raise $5,000 for the network, which would be a record," Lamott said.

In order to raise the money, the Sigma Chis invited K-State sororities to compete in a variety of competitions, from tug of war to a slumber relay.

At week's end, Delta Delta Delta stood atop the rankings, slightly ahead of second-place finishers Chi Omega, in the overall competition.

On their way to victory, the Tri-Delts won several individual events, including volleyball and the banner contest. They finished second to Chi Omega in the dance competition.

"At first, they told us we had won the dance competition. But then they recalculated the scores and said Chi Omega had won," said Heidi Moritz, Derby Days chairwoman for Tri-Delt and junior in business administration.

Although she said they will not receive any award for winning, Moritz said she felt Derby Days was well worth the time and effort put into it.

"It's a time for the whole greek community to come together and do something for a good cause," Moritz said.

For the second year, the Derby Days competition included a scholarship given to an outstanding member of a sorority. This year's winner was Lindsey Roy, member of Alpha Chi Omega and junior in advertising.

Alex Glenn, co-chairman for Derby Days, said he thought Derby Days was a complete success.

▶ The results
1st place: Delta Delta Delta
2nd place: Chi Omega
Scholarship winner: Lindsey Roy, Alpha Chi Omega

"I wouldn't change anything," said Glenn, junior in business administration. "The weather was beautiful, we raised a ton of money, it all went real well. Overall, it was a big success."

Although Glenn said it was an overall success, he also said certain portions of the week stood out as particularly successful.

"The kickoff party had Ultimate Fakebook, and that was awesome," Glenn said.

"It was a lot of fun and raised a lot of money."

Glenn said he expected the event would set a record for money raised at K-State's Derby Days, but wouldn't be sure until he had a chance to count all the money they raised.

"We have so much cash that hasn't been counted yet. It's going to take me several hours to count it all," Glenn said. "We also still have some outstanding bills that have to paid, but I'm sure we went above $5,000."

Moritz said although no one knew for sure if they would reach their goal, one thing was for sure.

"We had a blast," Moritz said.

KSU Stadium expansion plans continue to change

▶PLANS MIGHT INCLUDE NEW BOXES ON EAST SIDE NEAR STUDENT SEATING.

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

Changes to the original concept of the expansion plan for KSU Stadium are being considered, Athletics Director Max Urick said Monday.

Reached at his home Monday, Urick confirmed reports of conceptual drawings that include adding luxury boxes near student seating on the east side of the stadium instead of the west. Those drawings were presented to potential donors at a meeting Thursday.

The meeting reportedly took place to show the expansion plans to possible tenants of the new luxury suites.

"Those are still concepts we're considering," Urick said when asked if any plans for the expansion included luxury boxes on the east side.

But Director of Facilities Planning Jerry Carter, who oversees all university planning, said if any plans had been made to change the location of the boxes, he didn't know about them.

"If someone's decided to put the skyboxes on the east side of the stadium, I haven't heard it yet," Carter said.

He said HOK Sports Facilities Group of Kansas City, Mo., was hired just last week to design the facility in conjunction with Manhattan architect Brent Bowman. Bowman could not be reached for comment.

Administrators who were reached for comment didn't know about changes to the design, including Assistant Vice President for Institutional Advancement John Fairman.

University planners had looked into adding east-side boxes earlier in the planning process, but discarded the idea, Carter said.

"It wouldn't surprise me that at that kind of preliminary level, they would be looking at something we looked at a year ago and discarded," he said.

URICK

Other stadiums that added elevated seating to their architecture have used the opportunity to add skyboxes, Carter said, adding that if seating already is being elevated to create an upper deck, it can be elevated 10 more feet to make room for the boxes.

He said a plan like that for KSU Stadium would add to the cost of the plan.

"There's a cost to go up that extra 10 feet or so," he said.

The original expansion plan, presented to students last fall before they defeated a referendum vote to help fund the project, included adding 24 new luxury suites to Dev Nelson Press Box on the west side of the stadium.

The expansion also included adding 7,000 new seats to the stadium, including 1,600 chairback seats on the east side.

Carter said any drawings from HOK are preliminary, whether or not they include moving the boxes to the east side.

"Where our guys are right now in the process is they've got a lot of sketch paper out," Carter said. "They're working at that level now, thinking 'Wouldn't it be neat if we could ... '"

He said he thought plans presented at the Thursday meeting in Bramlage Coliseum's Legends Room could have been misinterpreted, causing the confu-

Questions still linger for center

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Not much has changed with the design of the proposed K-State alumni center since the last time the design was exhibited publicly at a March 19 forum in Manhattan.

At that forum, the first one to which the public was invited to scrutinize the plans, several faculty from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design criticized the project as lacking urban scale and campus context and allowing parking concerns to dominate the site.

▶ Meeting info
The Campus Development Committee will meet at 2 p.m. Thursday in the Dykstra Hall conference room. The meeting is open to the public.

The $6 million, 48,000-square-foot alumni center is being designed by architects Gossen Livingston Associates, along with Professional Engineering Consultants, both of Wichita.

Bill Livingston, principal architect with Gossen Livingston, said his architects won't restart the design process until early June. He said they are continuing to update the building program, incorporating information from several forums throughout the state and the March 19 forum.

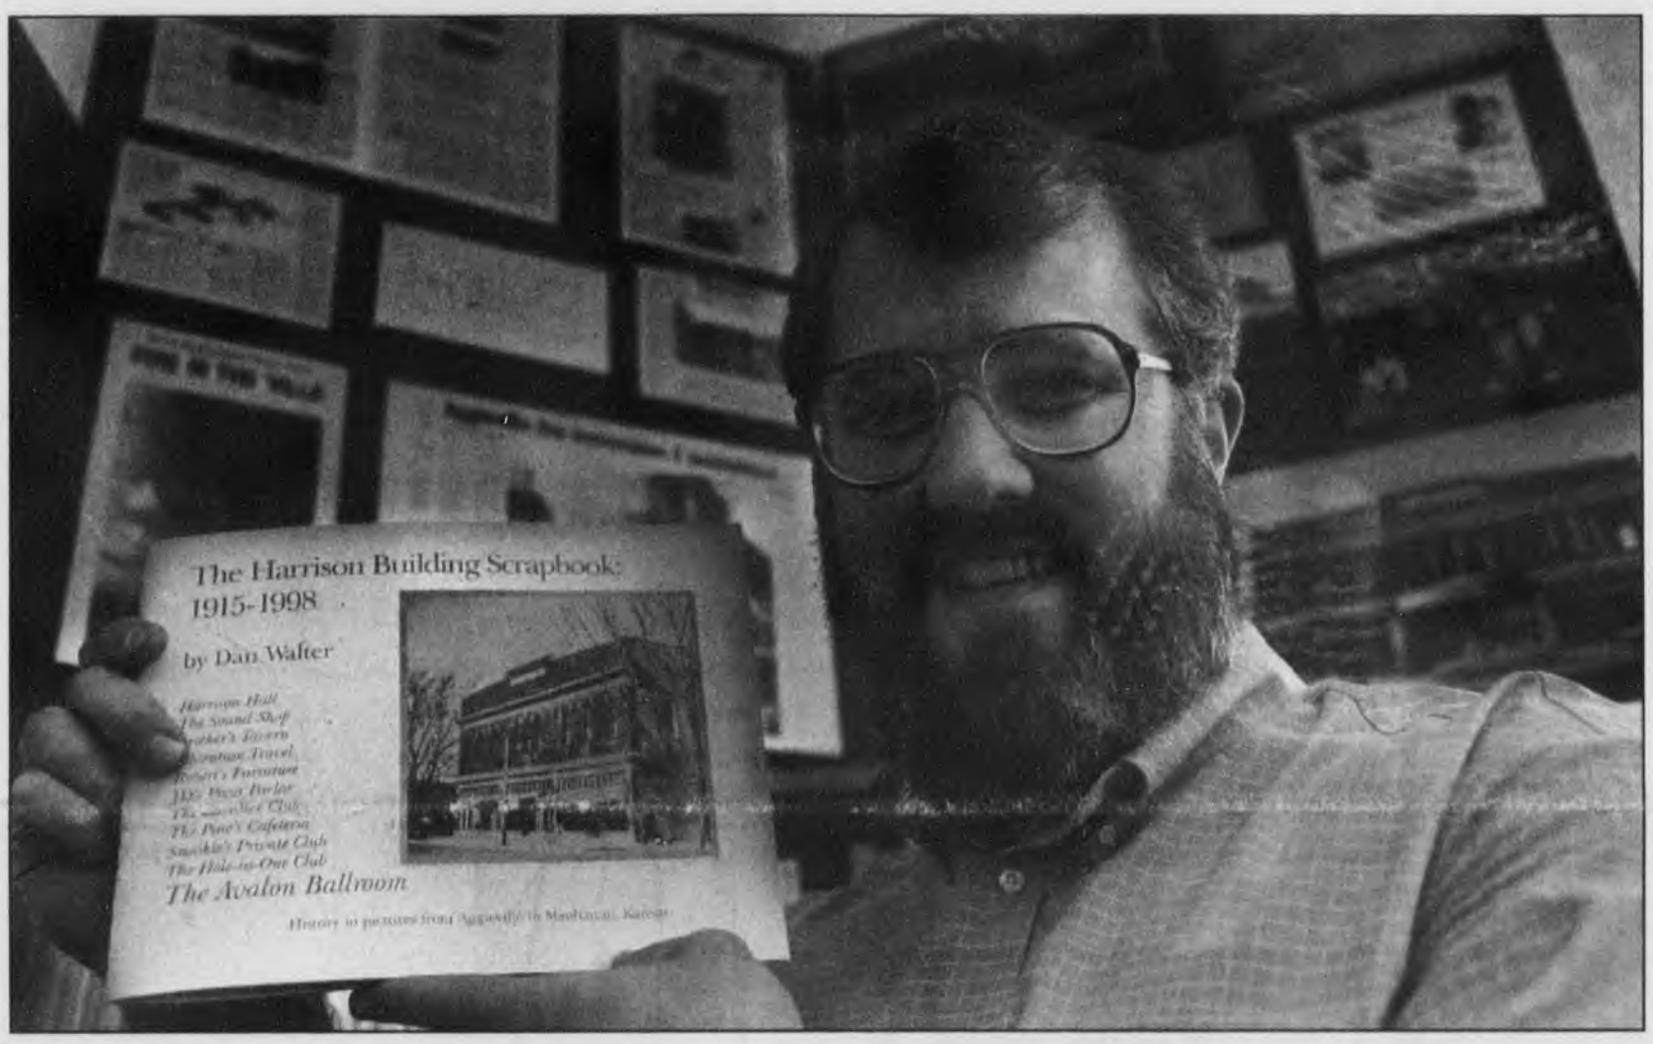
Ceremonies in McCain limit guests

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

The College of Human Ecology must make special arrangements so all friends, family and well-wishers will be able to watch its graduates receive diplomas this year.

McCain Auditorium would be too crowded if graduates were allowed unlimited guests, said Virginia Moxley, associate dean of human ecology. Fifty more graduating seniors than last year have said they will attend the ceremony.



▶ Ticket info
Mail your returned tickets to McCain Box Office, McCain Auditorium, Kansas State University, Manhattan, KS 66506-4711

The solution will be to grant free tickets to seven guests per graduate and allow them to watch from inside the auditorium at 9 a.m. May 16. Anyone else who attends will be able to watch the ceremony live on closed-circuit television from elsewhere on campus, Moxley said.

"We can guarantee that seven will see it in person," she said.

LORE OF THE 'VILLE

DAN WALTER, TEXTBOOK MANAGER AT VARNEY'S BOOK STORE AND SELF-PROCLAIMED AGGIEVILLE HISTORIAN, HAS WRITTEN A BOOK CHRONICLING THE HISTORY OF THE HARRISON BUILDING, WHICH BURNED IN FEBRUARY. MOST RECENTLY, THE BUILDING HOUSED CLUB KARRINGTON AND ADVENTURE TRAVEL.
JILL JARSULIC

Local author writes book chronicling history of Aggieville

ANDREW D. WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

A book commemorating historic Harrison Building in the Aggieville district has been written by Dan Walter, fewer than three months after an early morning fire, the cause of which never was discovered, destroyed the 83-year-old building at 1120 Moro St.

"The Harrison Building Scrapbook: 1915-1998," documents the changes of the building from a popular student hangout to a furniture store and back again.

Walter, a Manhattan area resident and textbook manager at Varney's Book Store, has written about Aggieville history before. In 1989, he wrote a book commemorating the centennial of the district. He also is working on an anthology of patrons' memories of Aggieville.

Walters said naming his current book was one of the hardest parts of producing it.

"People of different eras remember the building as different things," he said. "It's changed hands so many times, it's hard to just say it's one thing. Other people remember it as something else."

The Harrison Building housed many different student hangouts, from the Avalon Ballroom in the 1930s to the Cavalier Club and Bombers in the 1990s.

Walter said Brothers Tavern was the place to be in his day as a student at K-State; the bar was in the Harrison building.

"Brothers Tavern was next door to J.D. Pizza Parlor, and they used to pass pizza back and forth through a hole in the wall," he said. "One night when I was at Brothers, it was last call and they turned on the lights.

"I remember thinking how mysterious and cool it was in the dark, but with the lights on, it was not as glamourous," Walter said.

Walter said his first book inspired comment from numerous readers who remembered their time in Aggieville.

"After the first one in 1989, I received a lot of feedback from people who wanted to share their special memories of Aggieville," he said. "I had been collecting data for that, and decided to use some of that information in this one.

"'Aggieville Memories' is still a few years down the road," Walter said of his next planned work.

He said the business district is a special place for many former students who still return to Aggieville when they visit Manhattan.

"A lot of former students who come back for a football game or something end up swinging down to Aggieville," Walter said.

"Aggieville holds many personal memories for a lot of people. I hope my books help capture those feelings."

Legislative session ends with historic tax cuts, changes in political power

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Statehouse leaders Monday were basking in the afterglow of a session they described as successful, with both parties and both chambers claiming credit.

Historic tax cuts and bolstered education spending led the accomplishment lists of both parties and the governor, but consensus dwindled from there.

House Majority Leader Robin Jennison, R-Healy, said the effects of some of the most significant legislation — which he identified as that dealing with tourism and hog farms — wouldn't be felt for some years.

"I think immediately, most people will say it was an all-right session," Jennison said.

"In time, they'll see it was more than an all-right session. It was a very good session."

While Democratic leaders said they didn't get everything the party wanted, such as college scholarships and reducing state debt, the session was "overall, thumbs up," in the words of House Minority Leader Tom Sawyer.

Senate President Dick Bond, R-Kansas City, said that with the $247 million in tax cuts, "clearly it was a very successful session."

But he also voiced frustration, saying abortion politics threatened to stall significant legislation four times and the House failed to act quickly on a number of Senate bills.

"You don't do a careful and thorough job when you're shoving bills over to the Senate in the waning hours," he said.

"Abortion politics dominated far too much," Bond said. He cited bills dealing with governance of the University of Kansas Medical Center, health benefits for state employees and health insurance for children.

"The main appropriations bill was held up by abortion politics, and that's troublesome to me," he said.

"Regular Republicans constitute a vast majority of the state, and the question is, are they going to get off their rears and go to the polls?"

Sawyer and Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley said they agreed with Bond's assessment. Hensley said he was approached a number of times by pro-life senators with offers of "trading votes."

Jennison said time will tell that the 1998 session did a lot for the state. He cited legislation to promote development of resorts at state parks, legislation to ease the building of an auto speedway in Wyandotte County, a bill that writes environmental regulations for large hog farms into state law, and the partial reinstatement of a bank privilege tax.

Jennison said that while the bank tax raises money to help pay for a cost-of-living increase for state retirees, it's not so much that it costs more to bank in Kansas than in other states. That, he said, will encourage rural banks.

Bond criticized the bank tax, saying it actually was a gift to most financial institutions.

"Every legislator ought to get a thank-you note from every banker and savings and loan in the state. And a Christmas card," he said.

Frustrations over last-minute haggling between the House and the Senate were also on the minds of leaders Monday. The bank-tax issue was key to funding the pension increase, and that was necessary to solve problems with the final budget bill, called the omnibus bill.

Unabomber sentenced to life in prison, offers no explanation, apology to court

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Unflinching and unrepentant, Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski was given four life sentences Monday as families of his victims prayed aloud for his eternal damnation and demanded that he be locked up "so far down that when he dies he'll be closer to hell."

"He's diabolical, evil, cunning, a murderer," said Susan Mosser, whose husband, Thomas Mosser, died before her eyes in New Jersey after he opened a bomb sent by Kaczynski.

The outcome of the sentencing was never in doubt: U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. gave the 55-year-old former mathematician four life sentences plus 30 years, as spelled out in a plea bargain reached in January. Kaczynski's plea spared him the death penalty and a trial in which his lawyers planned to portray him, against his will, as deranged.

When given a chance to address the court, Kaczynski, the man whose 35,000-word manifesto against the evils of technology filled eight newspaper pages, spoke only briefly, offering no apologies and no explanations.

He strode to a courtroom lectern and, in a high-pitched nasal voice, complained that the government had lied about his anti-technology philosophy and was "discrediting me personally."

"I ask only that people reserve judgment on me and the Unabomber case," Kaczynski said. He said he would explain his motives at a future time.

In imposing the sentence, the judge said, "The defendant committed unspeakable and monstrous crimes for which he shows utterly no remorse." He added that he feared Kaczynski would try to kill again if not closely watched.

The Unabomber, so named because he targeted university professors and airlines as well as others in his anti-technology terrorist campaign, killed three men and injured 29 others in 16 attacks between 1978 and 1995.

The plea bargain covered the three deaths and the maimings of two scientists. As part of the plea bargain, Kaczynski acknowledged responsibility for all of the Unabomber attacks.

He will be sent to a high-security federal prison, possibly in Lompoc, Calif., or in Colorado.

Susan McDougal indicted on contempt, obstruction charges in Whitewater case

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Former Whitewater partner Susan McDougal was charged Monday with three felonies for refusing to tell a grand jury what she knows about the first family's business dealings, including a previously undisclosed check she marked with the words "Payoff Clinton."

The indictment was handed down by a grand jury here that this week finished two years of Whitewater-related investigation, and prosecutors signaled they might be ending the Arkansas phase of their probe by announcing they won't seek to impanel a new grand jury.

Whatever decisions remain now will be moved up to Washington, D.C., where prosecutors are probing the Monica Lewinsky matter and allegations of obstruction of justice, said Charles Bakaly, a spokesman for Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr.

"One option certainly is that certain evidence gathered by this grand jury could be made available to another grand jury that would also have venue over potential crimes," Bakaly said.

Whitewater prosecutors are not expected to take any action against first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton before the grand jury expires Thursday, leaving such decisions to later in the investigation, sources familiar with the investigation said.

Monday's indictment threatens to punish McDougal with years of more prison time for her feisty and high-profile campaign to refuse answering prosecutors' questions.

McDougal, 43, was charged with two counts of criminal contempt for refusing to answer grand jury questions, in September 1996 and again last month, and one count of obstruction of justice.

Her lawyer promised to take the case to trial and to use such a trial to examine recent allegations that one of the prosecution witnesses in an earlier case against his client had been paid by conservative critics of President and Hillary Clinton.

"She is not going to be bullied by them," attorney Mark Geragos said, insisting he would subpoena Starr and his top deputy as witnesses.

Bakaly said McDougal had been granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for her testimony and had no legal grounds for refusing a judge's order to cooperate.

"There is not a constitutional right not to answer questions," he said, also accusing the president of placing himself into the highly public feud between prosecutors and McDougal with comments the president made in interviews.

That allegation drew a sharp retort from the Clintons' private attorney.

Starr "through his public relations officer, has seen fit to assert that the president somehow improperly injected himself into the investigation," David Kendall said.

"The president's statements have been both accurate and appropriate," he said. "It is for the public to judge what the independent counsel's motivations might be."

Starr issued a statement saying the indictment did not accuse the president of wrongdoing, but court documents attached to the indictment revealed previously undisclosed evidence affecting President Clinton.

CORRECTIONSCLARIFICATIONS

A quote in Monday's Collegian from Mike Crawford, a Manhattan resident who won a big-screen television in last weekend's Million Dollar Hole-In-One contest, contained an error. Crawford said, "I look at it like this — I was six feet from retiring, but I also was six feet from handing that over to Uncle Sam," of a missed shot that cost him the $1 million grand prize.

The story "Area restaurants cited for health-code violations" reported incorrect information. Rusty Wilson, owner of Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, dismissed a cook when the food-service sanitarian observed the cook touch raw ground beef without washing his hands before other food preparation.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

USDA grants give K-State researchers nearly $1 million

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Nearly $1 million in research grants has been awarded to three K-State projects.

The funds will be used for research focusing on meat safety, water quality and sustainable farming.

Awarded through the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the $940,000 in grants is part of a new program called Funds for Rural America.

Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture and director of the Agricultural Experiment Stations and Cooperative Extension Service, said the Fund for Rural America program was created by U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Dan Glickman.

"This is the first year that this particular funding mechanism has been used by the USDA. Secretary Glickman wanted to create a competitive grant fund based on applied work, rural development, and the generation of partnerships between universities and other organizations," Johnson said.

The water-quality study was awarded $400,000, the meat-safety project received $440,000, and the sustainable agriculture work was granted $100,000.

Johnson said the projects being conducted with the money are important to Kansas agriculture and the public in general.

"These grants are focusing on two of the most difficult public relations stands in agriculture, the environment and agriculture, and then the safety of our food," Johnson said. "I can assure you that Kansas agricultural producers and K-State researchers have a genuine concern with food safety and clean water in this state."

The first funded study will develop work in conjunction with the University of Nebraska and several state agencies to improve drinking-water quality. The project will implement Best Management Practices in the Blue River Basin of Kansas and Nebraska.

Meat safety in small processing plants will be researched by 10 K-State faculty. Existing processing technologies in small meat-processing plants will be evaluated. After the evaluation, steps will be taken to develop materials for training plant workers in the Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Point processes.

Elizabeth Boyle, animal sciences and industry extension specialist, said there are several components being studied in the meat-safety research.

"There's a lot of different components to this particular grant. We have nine primary objectives," she said.

Boyle's work will focus on the training methods to implement in the small meat-processing plants.

"My work is to develop a distance learning HAACP course. It's going to be rather innovative in computer capabilities," she said.

In the sustainable agriculture project, K-State will help farm families across the state plan, develop and transfer sustainable farming systems into their practices. The project is called the Heartland Sustainable Agriculture Network.

Open Meetings Act exists for public inclusion

The Kansas Legislature passed a bill Monday nullifying Attorney General Carla Stovall's recent opinion on serial communications needing to comply with the Open Meetings Act.

This action comes on the heels of Manhattan City Commission's decision to raise its quorum from three to four, thus narrowing what is considered an open meeting.

The Open Meetings Act is under fire from governing bodies, and most people don't understand just what's at stake.

By nullifying the attorney general's opinion, public bodies might be able to be in the situation where one member contacts another, and that second member contacts a third, and so on.

By the City commission raising its quorum to four, two commissioners, the majority of the quorum, can get together and talk about city business in private. They can talk about your business in private.

The spirit of the Open Meetings Act is that government cannot be allowed to operate behind closed doors. Elected officials should be going to their constituents to get opinions — not to each other.

It's true the Open Meetings Act causes some inconveniences. It's true that sometimes it's easier to work in the back room. But the act shouldn't be toyed with. Public business should stay in the public eye.

People got a dose of the secrecy game when the commission had refused to name Sykes Enterprises Inc. as the business that was coming to Manhattan. Most said they felt uncomfortable with the city working behind closed doors and refusing to be forthcoming to the voters.

With restrictions on the Open Meetings Act, such occurrences could become commonplace. While the people writing the legislation might have the best of intentions, it nevertheless opens the door for a public official in the future to close the door to the public unethically.

For the Legislature's bill to go into effect, it would need Gov. Bill Graves' signature. The new rule in Manhattan takes effect if nobody files a protest petition.

Reading between the lines
THE TRUTH ABOUT WORKING AT THE COLLEGIAN

There was a time when I admired the people at the Collegian. Well, most of them. I'd recognize names from bylines and there were a few columnists whose work I enjoyed. There were a few columnists I wanted to wait for in front of Kedzie Hall and slap silly, demanding, "Why in the wide world of sports can't you write about SOMETHING DIFFERENT this week? I know you're gay, all right? Don't impress me, DISTRACT me!"

Then I opened my eyes and I'm sitting in front of a Macintosh, trying to figure out what to write that won't have 20,000 students screaming for my blood.

So today our long national nightmare comes to an end; I'll break my keyboard, and somewhere deep on my zip disk I'll drown my columns. To be uncharacteristically brief, I'm a vapor trail, outta here, toast on a stick.

But before I go, there's a few things I wanted to say to you. Yes, "you," whoever you are. I've never wanted to turn my columns into 20-odd column inches of self-promotion. You can't care less about my Holstein key chain (his name's Milk Dud Jr.) or why I hate water. You don't care who I sleep with (and if you do, maybe you shouldn't). But there's a space to fill in the paper, and odds are you pick up the paper just like I do, to pass some time, maybe learn a lil' something, get a chuckle or two. You don't pick up the paper to get to know me.

The art of a conversation is talking to someone not about yourself, and that's what I've wanted the columns of the past year or so to be, a conversation. Well, it's been a rather one-sided conversation, but you've spoken when I've tripped a wire. There's been the rare occasion when someone's read and decided, "Hey, that was pretty neat. I'll drop him a line," and the more frequent "Who the hell does he think he is? I'll show him!"

Maybe you think we're inundated with letters at the paper. Not bloody likely. Dead people get more mail than we do. That makes every voice that speaks even louder. Same thing applies to me. I'm just one deranged individual. If I thought Kansas should annex Ohio through force, nobody'd blink. If I said so in the newspaper, well, it gets attention, obviously more than it deserves. Voices are heard; silence is capitulation.

I've tried to distract you from the fact you're more likely than not trapped in a class more boring than an arthritic, medicated snail (no, bad, don't look at the class, look back at the paper — there, that's better), and who knows, maybe you're teaching it. I've tried to make you chortle aloud. I wanted you to know things other people wouldn't tell you.

In that vein, there are a few things you should know about this publication I never would have suspected before coming here.

For one, I never realized the levels, intensity and fervor of copy editing. It always seemed like a columnist just wrote from mind straight to newsprint. God knows it looks that way some days. But everything I write has to go through my ever-patient editor, Claudette Riley, two copy editors du jour (usually Becky the "Jeopardy" goddess and Amy the A&E dominatrix), and apparently anyone else in the newsroom bored enough to inflict my work upon themselves.

More often than not, this is an invisible process. They touch up, correct my minor mistakes ("Uh, Ken, y'might wanna know that it's not spelled "Weee!fald"), dot my t's and cross my i's. Then again, sometimes an edit slips in that baffles this writer's mind ("Let's change all the vowels to consonants!"), and I go a little postal in my head.

They can insert parenthetical comments wherever they want (copy editors rule!), and I don't know where they get some of these headlines. But overall, follow this basic rule: When I make sense, it's their copy editing shining through; where I'm totally incoherent, that's me in the spotlight, usin' my opinion. The copy editors get no credit and more than enough blame; it's a pity.

What else about this place do you need to know? Some days you'd think all that the reporters around here do are stake out campus athletes and burn student senators in effigy while thinking of the next interesting quote they can attribute to someone in the theater department. But when I see that look in Claudette's eyes when she knows she's got a story that the people of K-State want to know about, there's no self-interest, no ulterior motive in dem baby blues — it's some kind of perverse journalistic desire. It's spreading, too.

A lot of people in this newsroom are carriers (I am not a journalist; I'm immune), and if you can't see it in their eyes, you can read it in this paper. Thumb through it, see who's infected. See which ones want to stuff their résumés and which just want to tell the truth.

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

Ken is a graduate student in English. You can send e-mail to Ken at sigma7@ksu.edu.

Then there's Ron Johnson. I wish you all could meet this man. If you haven't, find a reason to. He's the news adviser, a fount of wisdom, cooler than LOX. I've not met many people anywhere who care as much about their work or do it as well as Ron Johnson. He should be proud of his work, as should all of us.

If there's one thing I'd want to share with you it's that any damn fool can do this. I've proven that on a weekly basis. You don't have to be a journalist to speak your mind. These are the same people who paid me to be a cartoonist, for God's sakes. If you've got an opinion, share it. Here, take my gauntlet. It's your turn now.

Praise be to Dan Peterson for helping me get this far, to Judith for keeping me alive, to Marny for some of the coolest cartoons I've ever seen, to the staff of the Collegian for being dysfunctional enough to be around, Dad for ensuring I didn't turn this city to a radioactive soup and to you for reading this drivel. If I made you even crack a smile at least once, well, then, all of this wasn't just a big waste of time.

Columnist bids farewell to K-State, ponders future

My life has been reduced to song titles. "The Party's Over." "This Is It." "I'm Outta Here." "So Long, It's Been Good to Know You."

With that, I say adios to my weekly column and (for now) to K-State. Oh yeah, and I have no stinking clue what happens next.

Yes, I have a job in the Bay area, but the urgency to get there isn't as big to me anymore. Fortunately, I can start whenever I get there. But there's another fly in the ointment. I've had a few new offers come along from various parts of the country, and now I'm more confused than ever. So for now, with my mind a complete ball of wax and finals coming, I just can't think about leaving. At least not out loud, anyway.

What I do know for sure, though, is that I'll be back to visit my soon-to-be alma mater. It would be such a gross mistake to forget about the institution that brought me so much. I would be remiss not to give back some of what I've gotten, especially financially. Academic scholarships came my way that made the financial burden of college practically nonexistent. For that I, and my credit rating, will be forever grateful.

I already have promised myself that when I become an adult (again!) I plan on making financial contributions to this institution in the form of academic scholarships. I want others to have the same opportunities and hopefully garner as much out of their time here as I have.

When I came to Manhattan, I had the usual misgivings. For the first time, I would be living a reasonable distance from family. I was pretty much alone. And class sizes? I'd spent all of my college life at community colleges. Not only was I unfamiliar with the university setting, I was sure I'd spend half my time getting lost. I didn't. At least not forever.

I found that the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications was located centrally. It's a good thing, too. Too many classes in different buildings meant too many choices. Remember me? I'm the Libra; decision-making isn't my forte. I easily could have ended up a social science major, or a history aficionado, or interior design student. Over the years, these were all things I had wanted to do. After I'd met with a journalism school adviser, though, I knew I wanted to spend most of my time in Kedzie Hall. And I did. Just ask the secretary.

The time spent in Kedzie brought me some of the best instructors in public relations, radio-TV and electronic journalism. Of course, everybody says that about the professors in their major. And like a true journalism schmooze, I really mean it.

By the end of the first semester, I was in love. Not with a guy or anything. I was starting to love my life. No longer was I playing an 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. game of chance that included pantyhose, high heels and lying for my boss. While I was still up at the crack of dawn, what I did after that was pretty much up to me. Usually I could be found in class, though sometimes even the Spirit couldn't get me there.

I drop-kicked the pantyhose/high heels combo. Being able to wear jeans and running shoes became a way of life. Of course, lack of clean laundry always necessitated more formal dress. And the only time anyone caught me without my face painted was when I was sleepwalking. That's not vanity, mind you; that's just not wanting to scare anyone else more than I want to scare myself.

Once those pre-major courses were out of the way, I finally was allowed to take more of the classes I really wanted. Even though some of the course requirements weren't what I'd hoped for, or even ones I did well in, they did serve a purpose. First, they made me realize what I was and wasn't capable of understanding. I knew I'd never understand anything about new digital technology. But they also provided me with instructors who cared enough to try and hand-hold me through my struggle, even when I struggled so hard I wouldn't let them help me.

Then summer school came along. Not with fun bells and whistles; it was more like "Taps." But I knew two things: I had an apartment to pay for, which meant working during the summer, and if I didn't take a couple of classes, I'd have a much heavier load in the fall. As much as I didn't want to do anything that summer, I'm glad I did everything. You wouldn't think that taking ethics or Spanish in the summer is 10 times better than taking them in a regular semester, especially while you're gazing out of the window in a hot classroom. Then you take them, and they're over before you know it. That's two classes I didn't have to see again.

There was also an eeriness about town that first summer. I could turn left at Bluemont Avenue and Third Street without the time changing on me. And there was no waiting in Aisle 7 anywhere. It was unreal. And real nice.

I wondered what the rest of the people in Manhattan did during the summer, the ones who live here year-round. Do they look forward to summers, holidays and spring breaks, when they can have the town back to themselves? Do they peek out of their windows, knowing that, albeit temporary, it's OK for them to come out?

Finally, August 1997 had arrived. Over the next nine months, my friends and I would be counting down to our baby, graduation day. Like having a baby, things have gotten bigger and bigger, then in one shining moment it's going to be over. And we'll probably be paying for it the rest of our lives.

I thought I'd be immune, but senioritis hit me hard. Waiting until the last semester to take science lecture and lab courses was not the smartest thing to do. If you blinked, you might have missed me in class. No one ever should have told me that all I need is a 2.5 grade point average in my major, and I just have to pass everything else. I'm more than good-to-go in my major; it's that "everything else" course where I'll just squeak by. But that's OK. I've proven my point to myself. I took the 10-year college plan and set it on it's rear, I mean, ear. I accomplished what I set out to do when I moved here, and that's all that matters. I'm tired. I need sleep.

Whether you came here as a freshman or, like me, transferred at some point, I hope you'll take away as many memories of the good times as I did.

Look for me at graduation. I'll be the one wiping away the tears.

Professor challenges columnist's sources

Editor,

Every three years or so a column appears in the Collegian challenging the notion of the global climate change and taking to task those who are concerned by it. Sam Sackett's column in Friday's paper is the latest example of this. Fully rebutting Sackett's column would require considerably more time than I wish to spend on writing this letter, but I do want to answer a few of his points.

Sackett makes the same mistake as many ill-informed commentators when he automatically equates ozone depletion with global warming. They are somewhat interrelated, but are two distinct issues.

The evidence for global climate change is compelling. Temperatures are increasing. The best estimate indicates that since the late 1800s, global mean temperature has increased by about 0.5 degrees Celsius. This might not sound significant, but consider that during the height of the last ice age, when about one-third of the earth's surface was covered with ice, global mean temperature was only about 5 degrees less than it is now.

Small global temperature changes can have significant effects. Add to this some of the well-documented correlational evidence of temperature increase, such as sea-level rise, glacial melt, changes in global phenology, alteration of atmospheric circulation patterns — all of which were predicted by the global climate models so vilified by the critics — and the case for concern about global climate change becomes well-founded indeed.

Sackett criticizes the scientific community for its concern about environmental issues, implying scientists and political figures concerned about environmental change are "liberal extremists" who overhype or even falsify data in an attempt to frighten the general public into behavioral or lifestyle changes.

Yet Sackett cites as evidence for his views a petition circulated by a group led by Dr. Frederick Seitz, a past president of the National Academy of Sciences. Dr. Seitz is a fellow of the George C. Marshall Institute, a conservative think-tank with a long history of support for anti-environmental issues.

About a month ago, I received a copy of Seitz's petition, which included what appeared to be a research article containing data the petitioners claimed showed that solar variations are responsible for much of the warming noted in the earth system. Interestingly, the author lit of this "paper" includes a solid-state physicist (Seitz), two astronomers, and Seitz's son, an undergraduate at the University of California. It did not contain a single climatologist or atmospheric scientist.

Further inspection of the manuscript revealed that, while it was formatted to look like an article published in the journal Science (probably the world's most prestigious scientific journal), in fact it had not appeared in a peer-reviewed journal at all. Peer review is the most important step in the process of presenting research to the scientific community.

This group did not submit their work to the process, yet made it appear like they had. Who is fabricating evidence here? I was curious enough about this petition to access Seitz's World Wide Web page, which lists some of the petition's signers. Sackett is correct there is a large number of signatures, and many of them do have academic credentials. However, few are climatologists or atmospheric scientists.

Contrary to Sackett's claims, among members of the climate research community, there is strong consensus for an anthropogenic signal in global climate change.

Much of my academic training is in climatology. I would not sign a petition having to do with other areas of science, simply because I have no deep expertise in those areas. The general public needs to recognize that many of the skeptics do not have adequate credentials in the most significant areas of the debate.

To close, I would like to say the skeptics are correct when they say there is no "proof" of global warming. However, science rarely ever "proves" anything.

Most scientific pronouncements are presented in terms of probability, and the probability humans are altering the earth system is increasing as solid evidence to support this hypothesis steadily accumulates. If I smell smoke in my house, I don't wait until the flames are climbing up my leg before I accept the fact there might be a fire.

Concern about environmental issues are not underhanded efforts at social control. They are well-founded prudence directed toward an utterly irreplaceable resource, our planet.

Hale collection needs proper recognition

Editor,

I took particular notice of your editorial board on Thursday praising the Manhattan Public Library.

In the editorial you stated: "Education majors might be interested in the (public) library's collection of children's books and young adult novels/works that would be out of place at Hale Library."

I am the education librarian at Hale Library and the Juvenile Literature Collection is one of my responsibilities. Your comment that children's books would be out of place at Hale implies to me you do not know of the Juvenile Literature Collection's existence or of its importance to the research of many people here on campus.

The Juvenile Literature Collection is made up of fiction and nonfiction books, includes both historical and current works, and provides early childhood to high school-age reading level materials.

These materials are critical to the curricula, teaching and research of nearly 1,000 faculty and students on campus, most notably those from the College of Education and the Department of English. The Juvenile Literature Collection certainly is not out of place in this research library.

The Manhattan Public Library has a wonderful collection of children's literature and young adult novels. Certainly the campus community needs to know this resource exists, but they also need to know that KSU Libraries' Juvenile Literature Collection is alive and well.

Politics corrupted tryouts, reader says

Editor,

First, I would like to commend all of the women who made the 1998-99 Classy Cats squad. But this is not why I am writing. What I am concerned about is the real fairness of the tryouts. The reason many did not make the squad was not because of their skill, but in the name of politics.

Wouldn't it seem evident that the captains of these squads already would be shoo-ins for the next year's team, and wouldn't they want all of their "friends" to be right there along with them? So where do all of the other members of the squad fit?

Oh, these much harped-about tryouts. I'm sure if you ask any former members of the Classy Cats who were more than likely weeded out, you'll find they aren't in not because of their skill as dancers, but because they didn't play the "favorite" game. It is a shame this happens, but it does. And my next question is, who is on the judging panel? We can't blame any of the fine ladies on the squad, but the judges themselves. I'm sure Athletics Director Max Urick has his hand in this somewhere.

So to Danielle Mitchell and all of the other women who didn't make it, don't be upset you didn't make it, be upset with the current panel of judges and their "system."

Change is good.

Graduates deserve to invite more than 7

Editor,

On Saturday, I received a disturbing letter from McCain Auditorium. It stated that because of the size of the spring 1998 graduating class from the College of Human Ecology, I am allowed to invite only seven people to my graduation. The letter included seven tickets of admission to the ceremony. Additional guests, the letter stated, will be allowed to watch the graduation via television in a separate room.

In my opinion, this is unacceptable. I have worked hard for the past four years to complete my degree, and I believe my family and friends should be allowed to witness my graduation in person, not via television.

As the first member of my family to graduate from college, I am proud of my accomplishment, and so is my family. I attended the graduation fair at the K-State Student Union on March 10 and purchased invitations for all my family members. There was no attempt made at that time to notify me of these limitations. I sent out 25 invitations, fully expecting all invited could witness my graduation. Apparently, I now am supposed to call all but seven of the people I invited and uninvite them or ask if they would like to watch my graduation via television in a separate room.

I do not understand why I should have to limit my guest list. I doubt any other college has the same policy. I know K-State has the facilities to accommodate the guests of the College of Human Ecology at graduation. However, rather than spend a little extra time and expense to make graduation enjoyable, the administration has chosen once again to infringe on the rights of students.

Embezzlement leaves reader with doubts

Editor,

The April 28 Collegian reported our new Wildcat Card has developed a $72,000 deficit, and now I see that Student Governing Association had lost another $100,000. With regard to the Wildcat Card, Patrick Carney, Union Governing Board president, was quoted saying, "We should all shoulder the $72,000 debt." I hope this sentiment doesn't apply to the $100,000, too.

I for one don't think it's my responsibility to shoulder anything as a result of other people's incompetency. First of all, I thought the new Wildcat Card was a bad idea. I only use it for checking out books from the library, and that's only because there is no other way of checking out books. Besides, my computer-generated picture on my Wildcat Card sucks.

If Carney wants to shoulder the debt, he can do it himself. Otherwise, just let the card go into bankruptcy or have some rich alumni pay it off.

Damage to Earth felt by all living beings

Editor,

I am writing in response to Sam Sackett's column "Mother Earth?" In it, he writes that there is no real crisis concerning the environment, and that the Earth is not in danger. I agree, the Earth is not in danger. Humans are.

When we pollute the Earth and continue to pour CFCs and carbon dioxide into the atmosphere, we are decreasing our chance of survival as a species. When we continue to use pesticides and chemicals on our fields to increase crop production, we are decreasing our chance of survival. When we continue to generate more trash than the Earth can dispose properly, we are decreasing our chance of survival.

We are doing this by decreasing the quality of our environment, the community into which we were born and in which we live. If this continues, the human race will one day die out.

In turn, we also are decreasing the chance for survival of all of the plants and animals that create our community. We are endangering their lives by urbanization, soil and water pollution, and by decreasing the ozone layer.

Even if the human species doesn't die off, why would we want to live in a land where we have killed off everything that makes life worthwhile?

In his column, Sackett writes, "Also, what 'harm' we have done is insignificant compared with what nature does every day."

This is, in part, true. The environment naturally creates huge amounts of carbon dioxide, much more than we produce. However, the problem started when we added our small amount to the large amount produced by nature, and what ensued was a growing hole in the ozone layer.

The Earth is not immune to our actions. It has scars that are seen readily in southeast Kansas, where large-scale strip mining has destroyed part of the natural system.

Yes, the Earth can heal itself. It is an efficient system, but can it keep up with the rate at which we are destroying it?

Brett admits Lamar Hunt would make great owner

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A surprise partnership between Lamar Hunt and a utility company to bid for the Kansas City Royals has found a fan in George Brett.

Brett and a group of investors made a competing bid for the Royals. But in an interview broadcast Sunday night on WDAF-TV, Brett said the Hunt Sports Group-Western Resources Inc. partnership would be positioned better to run the team like its founder, the late Ewing Kauffman.

Brett said Hunt's announcement stunned his group, which includes his brother, Bobby Brett, of Spokane, Wash.

"That's a great marriage," the retired Royals slugger said.

"It would be tremendous for this organization because I think they will be able to, in all honesty, be able to run it more like Ewing Kauffman did."

He added, "If we did it, depending on our investors, maybe we would say we had $25 million payroll and try to keep everything in tone and not lose a lot of money, where Lamar and Western Resources might go a little higher and say, 'We can afford to lose a little bit of money.'"

The financially troubled Royals have been without an owner since Kauffman died in 1993.

Hunt, owner of the Kansas City Chiefs football team, announced last week he and Topeka-based Western Resources had submitted a preliminary joint bid for the Royals.

They pledged to keep the team in Kansas City.

The only other publicly known bidder is New York lawyer E. Miles Prentice III. Royals officials said they hope to have a new owner identified by the All-Star break in July.

Hunt said his bid is competitive but would not elaborate.

The Royals board had set a minimum price of $75 million.

Bobby Brett said believed the Hunt-Western Resources group would put the Royals in the best possible financial light, WDAF reported.

Hunt said earlier he and George Brett had talked about submitting a joint bid, a combination that would have been immensely popular locally, but talks broke down.

At one point, the Brett group was the only entity expressing interest in buying the Royals.

It said it had two goals: to turn the team around and to keep it in Kansas City.

"If we got the ball rolling ... that's all that's important, that whoever got the team would keep the team here in Kansas City and make them competitive ... and a world champion again," George Brett said.

"And with Lamar Hunt at the helm it has a good chance to happen."

Kentucky center announces candidacy for NBA draft

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Nazr Mohammed, whose shot-blocking and rebounding helped lead Kentucky to the NCAA basketball championship, said Monday he would forgo a senior season and enter the NBA draft.

Mohammed, a 6-foot-10 center, said he would not hire an agent in order to protect his college eligibility in case he changes his mind before the June draft. He has until seven days before the draft to withdraw his name and return for a final year.

Marty Blake, the NBA's director of scouting, said Kentucky coach Tubby Smith contacted the league about Mohammed's potential in the draft. Blake said he told Smith, "The guy's not ready to play."

Another season of college ball would help Mohammed in virtually every aspect — educationally, emotionally, physically, artistically and financially, Blake said at the time.

"I'm in a great situation where I can explore my options," Mohammed said at a news conference, seated alongside Smith.

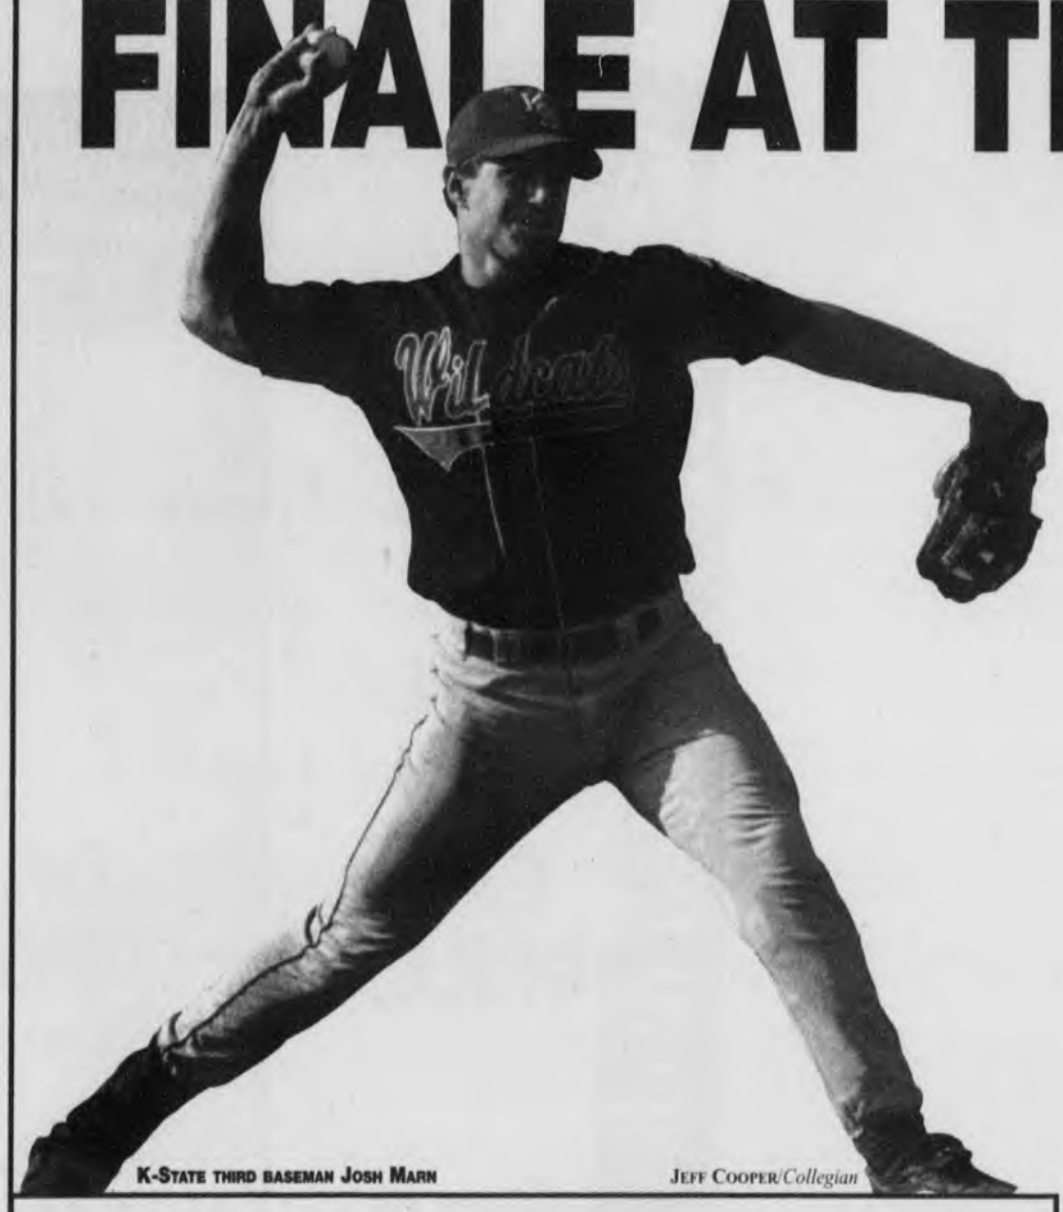
Mohammed led Kentucky in rebounding with 7.2 per game and blocked 75 shots.

He hit 60 percent of his field goal attempts, mostly from short range, and developed a deft hook shot.

If drafted even as low as 29th, Mohammed would be guaranteed an aggregate $1.8 million for three seasons.

Jim Mitchell, a Lexington-based scout for the Los Angeles Clippers, estimated this spring that Mohammed would be among the top-20 draft picks.

The Wildcats have been in the Final Four of the NCAA Tournament four times in the 1990s, including championships in 1996 and 1998. The biggest stars of the previous teams opted for early jumps to the NBA.

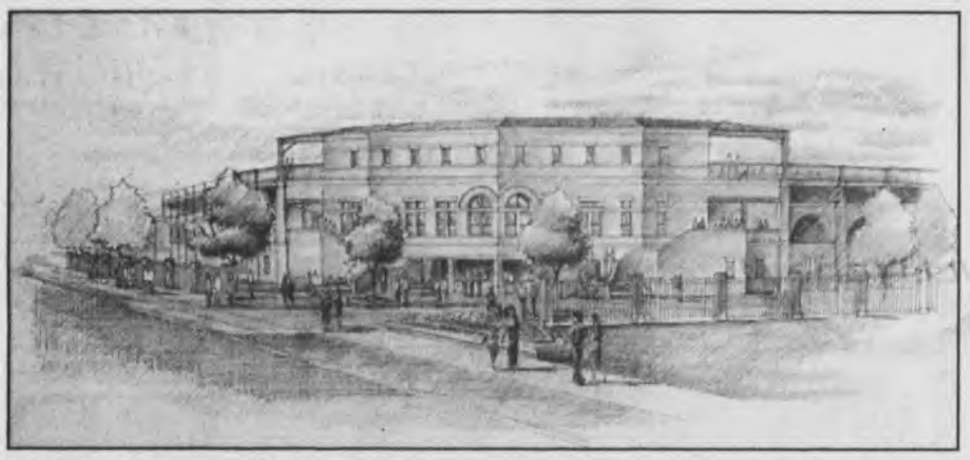


Jamal Mashburn, now of the Miami Heat, entered the 1993 draft.

Antoine Walker and Ron Mercer, both of the Boston Celtics, left Kentucky after the 1996 and 1997 seasons, respectively.

Smith said he tells recruits about players who get their degrees, not about a Kentucky pipeline to the NBA.

"Obviously, people see it," he said. "That's not why we recruit kids, so they can leave early."



FINALE AT THE FRANK

K-STATE THIRD BASEMAN JOSH MARN — JEFF COOPER/Collegian

After seeing more than 37 seasons and 500 wins, Frank Myers Field prepares for its last hurrah.

At 7 tonight, the last game will be played at K-State's historic baseball diamond, before construction begins on a new facility due to open for the 1999 Wildcat baseball season.

NEW STADIUM TO BE COMPLETED BY 1999

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics on Friday announced plans for a groundbreaking ceremony for a $1.5 million renovation of Frank Myers Field to take place before the Wildcats' non-conference matchup with No. 5 Wichita State today.

K-State president Jon Wefald, athletics director Max Urick, director of development Ernie Barrett, along with head coach Mike Clark and representatives from the Wildcat squad, will take part in the ceremony scheduled for about 15 minutes before the game's first pitch at 7 p.m.

Myers Field was built in 1961 to honor former K-State baseball coach Frank Myers, who despite coaching the Wildcats for just one season in 1940 was a well-known K-Stater in the program.

Myers had several positions in the athletic department, including assistant athletic director to the legendary Mike Ahearn. During their stay at Myers Field, the Wildcats have won more than 60 percent of their games.

On April 30, 1997, K-State picked up its 500th win at Myers Field with an 11-1 win over Bethany. The Cats have had just eight losing seasons at Myers Field in the 37 seasons they have called it their home.

Plans for the renovation of Myers Field include a new grass playing surface, new grandstands, a new press box and construction of locker rooms and offices for the K-State coaching staff. Construction on the surface is scheduled to begin immediately after the conclusion of the 1998 season and will no longer be called Frank Myers Field.

It will be known as the KSU Baseball Stadium.

Seniors hope to close park with win against Shockers

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Probably the one thing head coach Mike Clark has to be concerned about going into tonight's game at 7 against No. 5 Wichita State is where to dig for the groundbreaking ceremony scheduled before the game's first pitch.

"We have to figure out where to turn the shovel where it's not going to damage the playing surface," Clark said jokingly.

All jokes aside, the Cats will have their hands full against a 39-4 Shockers team, but for eight seniors, it will be the last time to showcase their talent in front of the home crowd.

"I have seen the game in a lot of ways," senior center fielder Eric Sommerhauser said. "This is the last time for me, so I am just going to have fun."

Seniors Mickey Blount, Tim and Pat Hertzel, David Meares, Yancy Ayres, Brian Bobier, Josh Marn and Sommerhauser will be honored as part of a senior-night celebration before the game.

The aforementioned led the team in almost every important statistical category. Marn, Ayres and Sommerhauser are the only members of the team batting more than .300, at .364, .333 and .304, respectively. Most of all, they have led a predominantly young squad to a better finish in the Big 12 than last year's squad.

Last year's team finished the conference 10-20, but was eliminated from the conference tournament long before this year's team was. These Cats sit at 7-16 in the conference and still have three games to play against Texas Tech.

"Last year we had a more talented team with Schesser and Fereday and those guys, and we were out of the conference race long before now," Clark said before the Baylor series. "We have a young group of kids, but these kids are being leaders and really helping those younger players out."

Clark was referring to all-American shortstop Heath Schesser, who is now with the Detroit Tigers organization, and second baseman Todd Fereday, who is now on the Chicago Cubs' farm.

However, even this late in the season, Clark still is stressing hard work, and he said he is giving every effort to make sure this team finishes strong.

"We have a lot of work to do," he said. "We are going to watch tapes of kids swinging the bats because, fundamentally, we are doing a lot of things wrong."

K-State, 20-27, played then 15th-ranked Wichita State on March 12 at Tyler Field at Eck Stadium in Wichita. The Cats jumped out to an early lead when Ayres hit a two-run homer in the first. The Shockers answered with seven runs in the bottom half of the inning.

K-State chipped away but couldn't stage a big enough comeback.

This time, the Cats said they hoped things will be different.

"They're a top-notch team and ranked in the top 10," Marn said of the Shockers. "We should be a little more focused and be ready to play on Tuesday and Wednesday."

Look at the picture. This is my protege.

This is an innocent 5-year-old whose talents include reciting the Pledge of Allegiance and eating chocolate chip cookies. This is an innocent 5-year-old whose interests include riding bikes and climbing trees.

Little does he know — someday he'll be a sports writer.

Saturday was baby-sitting day, so Scotty accompanied me to the Purple vs. White intrasquad spring game. Scotty liked the game. Was fascinated by the cheerleaders. Cheered when everyone seated around him cheered. Had no clue who he was cheering for.

Still, he enjoyed watching the guys run and pass and tackle and in between sips of Coke asked questions I tried to answer as best as I could.

He said, "What are they doing out there?"

I said, "One of the best football teams in the country is playing in front of its thirsty fans for the first time since the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. Everyone is watching to see if the preseason Wildcats are as good as everyone predicted."

Scotty squinted his eyes against the sun and looked up at me. "What is the Fiesta Bowl?"

"The Fiesta Bowl is one of the best places to spend New Year's Eve. It's where everyone dresses in purple and drives for days and days until they reach this big city and they watch the Wildcats win and Coach Bill Snyder stands and tells everyone thanks for coming and everyone leaves and drinks Coke for the rest of the night. If you're lucky, you might be able to come with me next year."

"Who is Coach Snyder?"

"Coach Snyder is one of the best coaches in the nation. He's the guy dressed in purple with the white hair, wearing glasses, standing on the sideline holding a rolled up newspaper in his hand."

Scotty said, "Is he the man pulling his hair out?"

"Well, yes. He's probably upset because that player wearing number five and carrying the football fell on the ground again. Snyder's actually a lot more calm today than he usually is. Usually he walks back and forth and talks loudly to those guys wearing black and white stripes. He wants K-State to win so bad. He never sleeps. He's been standing on the sideline for almost 10 years, and he wants a national championship this season."

Scotty shoved three Starbursts into his mouth and watched Michael Bishop throw a 40-yard pass flat-footed to Darnell McDonald, who caught the ball before falling to the ground. More than 12,000 fans inside KSU Stadium leaped to their feet and cheered.

"Who's that man wearing the white seven on his shirt?"

"That's Michael Bishop. All you need to know is that he's a good guy, a great quarterback, plays softball and watches movies a lot these days. He's a candidate for the Heisman Trophy."

He said, "What's the Hee-Man Trophy?"

"That's Heisman Trophy. It's what they give you when you're the best college football player in the nation."

"Uncle Scott," he smiled. "This is the most fun I've had in a long time."

Who could argue?

Snyder could. While fans all across Kansas formed the spring game's largest attendance Saturday and flooded the stadium to watch the Wildcats play one last time before September, Snyder stood on the sideline with his arms folded and a stoic look across his sweat-beaded face.

Snyder cannot win in the spring. If you asked him, the winningest football coach in K-State history would try to convince you his spring record is 0-9. Yep, poor coach lost every darn one. Boo hoo.

Sorry, Coach Bill.

I ain't buying it.

"I can't win," he pleaded after the game. "I'm caught in the middle of it."

Snyder said it's easier to be pessimistic or negative about his team's performance, because "one side is good and the other side is not so good."

Florida State's Bobby Bowden would take the opportunity after a 28-27 intrasquad decision to crack a joke: "What'cha got here wuz a good game, 'cause no matter what'cha do, you gonna win."

Bowling Green State's Gary Blackney would petition and demand the victory count as a regular-season win.

Snyder counted the game as a loss.

Was it a good afternoon?

"No," and he hands you the chuckle. "Kinda boring." (This coming from the man who celebrated New Year's by watching Fiesta Bowl reruns.)

But it was a practice.

"Ahh. I'm not so sure."

You said it was boring?

"I thought it was boring. I was bored to death. I couldn't wait to get out of there."

What Snyder obviously didn't see were the excited looks on the faces of the fans, most of whom stayed until the final minute of the three-hour game, which featured some players who will never see the field this season. Snyder could have lined up trainers and fans would have stayed and watched.

What Snyder didn't hear was Scotty sitting next to me, M&M's spilling out his mouth, drinking Gatorade, singing, "I wanna be, wanna be like Mike," after Bishop threw his third touchdown pass.

I tried to convince him he had the wrong Mike.

He didn't believe me.

NCAA settles $67 million suit with coaches

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — The NCAA was ordered to pay nearly $67 million in damages by a federal jury Monday for restricting the earnings of some coaches in violation of antitrust laws.

U.S. District Judge Kathryn Vratil earlier had found the NCAA guilty of antitrust violations. The lawsuit was brought by assistant coaches in various sports who had their earnings limited by the NCAA as a way for schools to save money.

The coaches who filed suit had sought $30 million on behalf of 1,900 coaches. The NCAA had said only 59 coaches were harmed and were owed $800,000.

The verdict came almost five years to the day the suit was filed.

In three separate rulings, the jury assessed damages of $11.9 million, $9.48 million and $1.5 million. The award was tripled because the case is an antitrust lawsuit.

The jury deliberated for about an hour Monday, after working Wednesday through Friday at the federal courthouse.

"The bottom line is we think this is a fair verdict," said Robert Wilson, a California attorney who represented several coaches.

Elsa Cole, a staff lawyer for the NCAA, said the verdict was extremely disappointing and indicated the association probably will appeal.

"We were not able to explain our position," she said. "The court did not allow us to do that."

Asked if Vratil was hostile to the NCAA, she said, "I don't have an opinion on that. She made rulings that prevented us from telling our story."

The NCAA also is liable for attorneys' fees in the case, which are estimated to be nearly $10 million.

The six-woman, four-man jury began deliberations after a three-week hearing with more than 50 witnesses, including coaches, athletics directors, economics professors and college presidents.

The restricted-earnings rule was adopted as a cost-cutting move by majority vote of the roughly 300 Division I schools at their convention in January 1991.

It took effect in August 1992, specifying that assistant coaches in various sports could make no more than $12,000 during the school year and $4,000 in the summer.

Almost immediately, three groups of coaches filed suit.

The cases were combined in a class action, representing all restricted earnings coaches at Division I schools. Vratil issued a summary judgment in 1996 that the rule was a violation of federal antitrust laws. The NCAA appealed to the 10th Circuit Court and lost there, too, sending it back to Kansas City for the penalty phase.

At the NCAA's request, the trial was moved from California to Kansas City.

The case took a bad turn for the NCAA in March 1996 when NCAA executive director Cedric Dempsey sent a letter to Division I schools suggesting they ignore Vratil's order to provide plaintiffs' lawyers with information on athletic department expenses.

A furious Vratil reissued the order and commanded Dempsey personally to appear in her courtroom, where he was chided for arrogance and foot-dragging in the case. Dempsey later testified for the NCAA during the penalty phase.

Black returns; K-State cleans up in Texas, Missouri

▶ TRACK STARS STRIKE WEEKEND GOLD, QUALIFY FOR NCAA PROVISIONALS.

The K-State track team posted a number of NCAA qualifying marks in both the Missouri Invitational and the Texas Invitational, but the highlight of the weekend was the return of an athlete who had been missing in action.

BLACK

Keith Black returned to the track after a month/long hiatus to play with the Wildcat football team. In his first meet since the UTEP Springtime Invitational on March 28, Black took the 400-meter gold medal at Missouri. He finished the race in 47.72 seconds.

"He's had three workouts in three weeks," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"I'm amazed at what he can do."

K-State thrower Gene Petersen had a good showing in the Missouri discus competition with an NCAA provisional-qualifying mark of 183-11 that was far enough to win the event.

On the women's side, Renetta Seiler continued her domination in the hammer with another victory. She won the event with a throw of 197-7.

"It's a pretty average throw for her," Rovelto said.

"She needs to get a feel for what it's like to throw really far, because for a chance to win at nationals she'll probably have to throw farther than she ever has before."

Seiler's longest throw to date is 207-6.

K-State's Anna Whitham took a distant second to Seiler in the hammer, but her throw of 185-6 was enough to qualify provisionally for the NCAA Championships.

Erin Anderson reached the NCAA provisional mark of 11-3 in the pole vault to capture the gold at Missouri. She also won the high jump with a leap of 5-9 3/4.

Kimela West jumped 19-5 1/2 to win the gold medal in the long jump.

The Cats who traveled to the Texas Invitational over the weekend were led by middle-distance runner Istvan Nagy.

Nagy captured the gold in the 800-meter run with a time of 1:50.5 — just 1 1/2 seconds from provisionally qualifying for the NCAA Championships.

"It was OK," Rovelto said of Nagy's performance. "He probably should have run a little bit faster, but it's a decent time for him."

The Wildcats had a one-two finish in the high jump, with Nathan Leeper taking the gold and Charles Burney taking the silver.

Leeper negotiated a provisional-qualifying height of 7-4, while Burney cleared 7-1 1/2.

Randy Melbourne finished in second place in the 400-meter dash with a time of 47.21.

K-State women who competed in Texas were led by freshman Amanda Crouse, who had two third-place finishes in the meet. She ran a personal record of 4:31.82 in the 1,500 meters and was on the third-place 1,600-meter relay team.

"I thought she ran really well," Rovelto said.

"That was a big PR, and a great time for a freshman."

Emily Diederich, Darcy Morris and Rachel Woods joined Crouse on the relay team, which ran a time of 3:46.11.

HE SHOOTS, HE SCORES

Collegian photographer wins award of excellence

STORY BY DIANA LEE • PHOTOS BY STEVE HEBERT

Steve Hebert had nothing to lose and some work of which he was proud.

He submitted a portfolio of his photographs to be judged for the College Photographer of the Year contest, an award that acknowledges the top collegiate photographers in the nation. Hebert earned a top-five finish for his efforts, an Award of Excellence for College Photographer of the Year.

"This contest is a big deal to us, because this is the contest where students from all over the country enter, and it is part of the annual pictures-of-the-year contest that professionals enter," Jill Jarsulic, Collegian photo editor, said.

Jarsulic also said the award brings notoriety to Hebert as well as to K-State photojournalism.

"It proves that he is one of the top shooters in the country," she said.

This contest is not limited to photojournalists, however.

"Any college student in the nation that has no more than two years of paid experience can enter. They'll accept entries from anyone who wants to submit one," Hebert said.

"I'd done a few internships, and I had some work that I'd done that I really liked, so I had nothing to lose by entering a portfolio," he said.

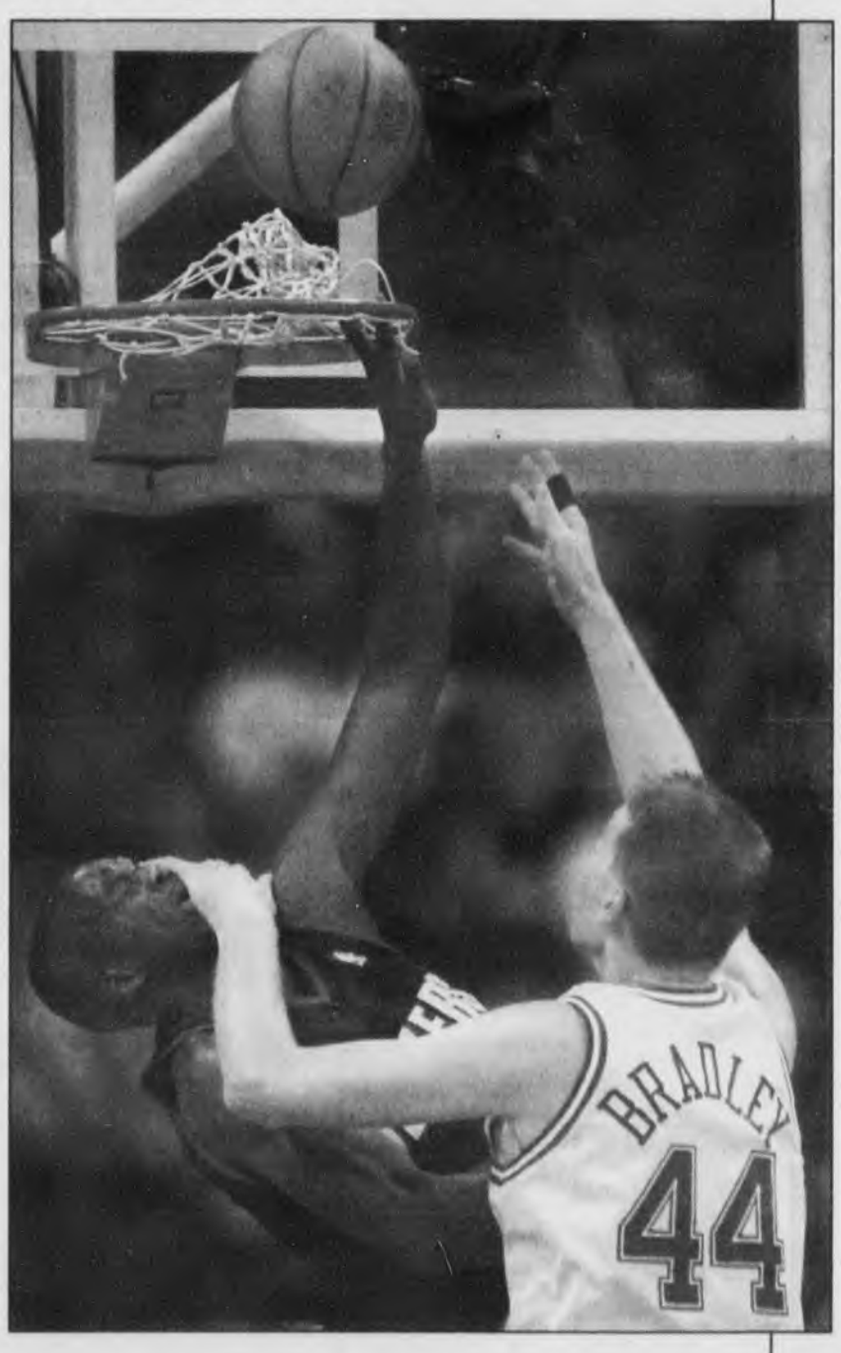
Hebert included photos from all ranges, randomly selecting photos from a year's worth of work. He said he included general-interest photos, feature photos and — his personal favorite — sports photos.

"I included a story I'd shot about a student here at K-State that died of cancer. I also included work I'd done for the Dallas Morning News about a 40-year-old male stripper," he said.

Hebert said his interest in photography comes from the fact that he wants a great deal of variety in his life.

"Every day is a different story. It's got the allure of seeing lots of different things and people," he said.

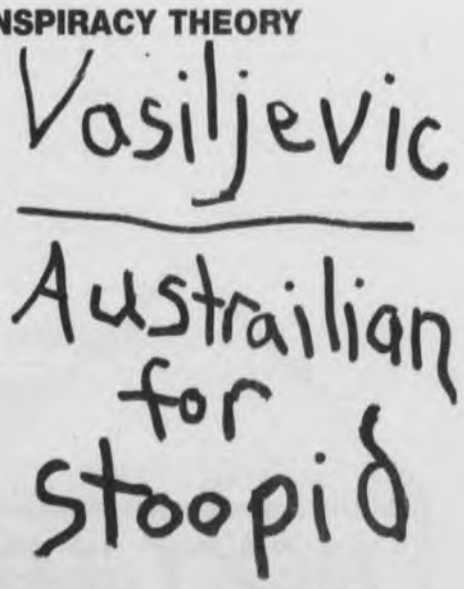
Hebert also said he enjoys working on long-term projects, in addition to shooting sporting events.



"I like working on the multiple-picture type of things, projects that last three or four months. You get the people you shoot to gain more trust in you," he said.

Hebert has worked for Student Publications Inc. for five years, taking photos for the Royal Purple yearbook and the Collegian. Hebert said he wants to move on from his internships and collegiate experience to a career in professional photojournalism.

"I'd like to move to a town with a good-sized metro paper. I want to work for a paper that's known for using photos well and that treats its photographers well," he said.



Hebert said he plans to keep working as a photojournalist as long as he can.

"I don't know what I'd do if I couldn't do this," he said.

Potters Guild to sell Mother's Day gifts today, Wednesday

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

Mother's Day is Sunday, and one group at K-State has the perfect solution for all students whose budgets are a little tight.

The K-State Potters Guild is having its annual Mother's Day Sale today and Wednesday outside the K-State Student Union.

The sale includes a wide range of pieces, and prices range from $3 to $75.

"We have some functional and more traditional pieces, and then we have some artistic and decorative pieces," Bert Stevens, senior in fine arts, said.

All of the pottery is completely food-safe.

"We don't have any kind of lead in our pieces," Stevens said. "The glaze on the pottery is decorative, and it's safe."

The sale is to help the Potters Guild with various costs.

Mike Lemke, graduate student in fine arts and president of the K-State Potters Guild, said the sale helps send students to a national conference every year.

"We have a conference every year in a different location," he said. "We send some students, and the money from this helps to pay for the fees and the travel."

Lemke said the money from the sale also supports the cost of bringing artists to the school for workshops and fees for the equipment that is used in the studio. The pottery being sold is donated by students and members of the guild.

"We donate 30 percent of what gets sold for our costs," Lemke said. "The other 70 percent goes to the artists who create the piece."

Christine Courtney, senior in interior architecture, said she already had put an item on hold.

"I've picked out a bigger piece that they are holding for me," she said.

"This is the best sale I've seen so far. The prices are really good."

Regents executive director takes university presidency position

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The leader of the Kansas Board of Regents' staff plans to resign to become president of a university in Washington state.

Stephen M. Jordan announced his decision Friday. His resignation as the regents' executive director is effective July 1.

The board oversees the operation of Kansas' six state universities, as well as the teaching programs at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan. As executive director, Jordan directed the regents' 18-member staff and often led its efforts in lobbying the Legislature.

Jordan plans to become president of Eastern Washington University in Cheney, Wash. Jordan said he will leave Kansas with mixed feelings, despite his excitement about becoming a university president.

"This is a time of great opportunity for higher education, and I am sure the Kansas system is well-positioned for the challenges that lie ahead," Jordan said. "Kansans have every right to be proud of their state universities."

Jordan has served as the regents' executive director since January 1994.

During his tenure, the regents clarified mission statements for state universities and began the process of setting goals and standards to measure how well universities were meeting those goals.

Also, with the board's support, the state enacted a law setting admission standards at the universities.

"While the board is sorry to see him leave Kansas, we recognize that this is an excellent opportunity and a definite step forward for Steve," said Regents Chairman Robert Talkington, an Iola attorney and former state Senate president.

Before joining the regents, Jordan served for five years as the deputy executive director of the Arizona Board of Regents. He also was vice chancellor for planning and budgeting at the University of Colorado's Health Sciences Center.

Eastern Washington University has 7,000 students and more than 1,000 employees, including 450 faculty members. It has two campuses, one in Cheney and the other in Spokane, 17 miles to the southwest. Its annual budget is about $95 million.

Jordan's decision affects regents universities, peers

SARA MARTIN
Kansas State Collegian

When Stephen Jordan announced his resignation as executive director of the Kansas Board of Regents to become president of Eastern Washington University, his decision not only affected the six Kansas regents universities, but also the individuals who have worked closely with him since January 1994.

"You've got to have a sense of trust and communicate well with someone in his position," K-State Provost Jim Coffman said. "We have really enjoyed that about Steve."

Faculty Senate president and professor of physics James Legg expressed his concern for Jordan's resignation.

"I definitely think his leaving is a loss not just to Kansas State, but to the whole regents system," Legg said.

Legg's worry comes with the immediate action of the board to create a search committee to send letters to universities and place advertisements about the opening.

"Any time you bring in someone new, there are both hopes and fears," Legg said. "You really do need a good person in that position, and I don't know what the future will bring."

Regents Director of Communications Barbara Conant said there should be a director in place by the September board meeting.

K-State President Jon Wefald also expressed his optimism for the new director.

"You can't expect the next person to be exactly like Steve Jordan," Wefald said, "but I'm sure this position will be attractive to a number of fine candidates."

Coffman said the appointment of a new director should have no adverse effects on K-State and the board, and that everyone involved with Jordan will miss something about their current director.

"He's done an outstanding job, and we'll miss him," Wefald said. "We just want to wish him the best with this wonderful opportunity."

Senate considers IRS overhaul bill for passage; questions about funding still linger

WASHINGTON, D.C. — After shining a harsh light last week on the ills of the Internal Revenue Service, the Senate turned Monday to a bill promising to overhaul the agency. Significant issues remain unresolved, including how to pay the bill's full $19.3 billion cost.

"It would be unseemly to bring a measure of this kind to the floor ... and then not manage to pay for it," said Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, D-N.Y., as the Senate began debating the measure. Nevertheless, the bill is expected to pass by a wide margin by Thursday after several days of debate.

The measure would create a new board to oversee the IRS and strengthen taxpayer rights, going far beyond a similar measure that passed the House 426-4 last November. It also would provide relief from some tax penalties and for so-called innocent spouses in tax-collection disputes, but these issues left the bill $9.8 billion short of revenue through a 10-year period.

Senate Finance Chairman William V. Roth Jr., the bill's main sponsor, said he was working on ways to pay fully for the legislation over a 10-year period.

Aides said Roth was close to announcing a plan to pay fully for the bill, but details weren't immediately available.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., said he was willing to support waiving the budget rules so the Senate wouldn't have to specify how to pay for it.

"To me, we have been overcharging taxpayers, we have been mistreating the taxpayer," Lott said.

Despite these differences, both parties moved to embrace the broader themes of the IRS restructuring bill, which would set in motion the biggest change in the agency's management since 1952.

The bill would strengthen taxpayer rights by requiring the IRS to suspend penalties and interest if the agency failed to contact a taxpayer within one year. It also would protect innocent spouses from IRS collection actions and eliminate the failure-to-pay penalty for taxpayers who agree to pay back taxes through installments.

The measure's nine-member oversight board would include private-sector representatives to develop long-range plans and police managers.

College limits seating for ceremony

Colleges like to use McCain for graduation because of its pleasant atmosphere, said Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology.

The availability of McCain depends on projected numbers of graduating seniors, Unger said, and this year the numbers said McCain could be used.

But not every graduating senior attends graduation, and the number who have said they will attend went from 195 last year to 245 this year, Unger said.

McCain doesn't have unlimited space, said McCain director Richard Martin. Going to more than seating capacity creates an unsafe situation, he said.

Every college but Human Ecology and Architecture, Planning and Design have moved to Bramlage Coliseum because of space. Lynn Ewanow, assistant dean of architecture, planning and design, said she doesn't see any problem with her college's graduates using McCain for the ceremonies this year.

Martin said if any tickets are returned, extras will be available on a first-come, first-served basis at 8 a.m. May 16 in McCain 211.

Each graduate may obtain up to two extra tickets if they are available.

Site design of alumni center in flux

Button Renz, have met with Livingston to discuss changes to the site. Further discussion with the university about parking and other site issues probably will occur later this month.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, said facilities has discussed with the Alumni Association the need for the building to be adjusted on the site.

He said facilities still is working on fitting a regulation playing field for intramural teams within the confines of Memorial Stadium.

Carter said the university and alumni center architects will need to coordinate many of the utility and site issues with the project before the city begins construction to widen Anderson Avenue.

While the design of the building is on hold, fund raising for the center has begun.

Karen Shafer, director of communications for the Alumni Association, said the association is working toward identifying potential donors and is planning to approach alumni donors on a personal basis.

Design plans for stadium expansion not set in stone sion about the luxury boxes.

"I'm not aware of there being any meeting with donors. I don't know if it was pitched that way," he said. "It makes a great deal more sense to me that if there were any discussion at all, there might have been some confusion about skyboxes that are happening on the west side and chairbacks on the east side."

But KSU Foundation President and Chief Executive Officer Gary Hellebust confirmed that discussion about the design of the stadium's east side took place at the meeting.

"They had a meeting to explain what the general plans were ... and it dealt with the east side of the stadium," he said.

Carter said any plans that exist aren't final.

The expansion, which is considered to be state-funded because of the process used to sell the $16 million bond, must be approved by campus planners, state architects and many other higher powers before it can begin.

"There's a fairly detailed process of where it goes," Carter said. "But all of that will happen before we send it off for any formal bidding process."

Urick couldn't say when final designs would be complete.

Hale Library still seeks resolution for funding

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Hale Library now is operating officially with a deficit.

Owing to the rising cost of journal subscriptions and not enough selective cancellations on the part of the university, the library is in debt this year by an estimated $50,000.

After a year packed full of meetings, task forces, forums and letters to the editor, the funding situation for Hale still is partially unresolved. At least, that was the consensus at Tuesday's University Library Committee's meeting.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said the administration has determined the Kansas Legislature will increase the Other Operating Expenditures budget by 1 percent each year to fund library needs. This would amount to $328,000 per year on top of the library's current $3.7 million operating budget, or a nearly 10-percent increase per year.

The university budget proposal now before the Kansas Board of Regents for fiscal year 2000, or the 1999-2000 school year, includes a request for a 1-percent OOE increase specifically for the library. There's also discussion of renewing discussion next year on a student privilege fee for Hale.

But to understand where the library is going, it's important to understand where it's been.

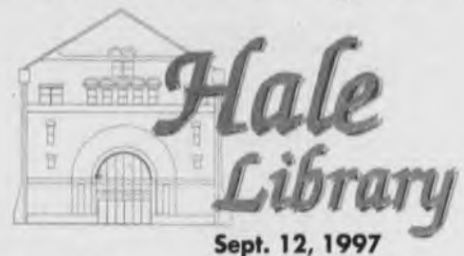
A year of highs and lows

The past year has been a benchmark for the library.

Hale was dedicated in early November, but the lack of funding for journal subscriptions — whose prices have far out-paced inflation — became a central campus issue in September.

The Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century, which first convened in May 1997, delivered its recommendations in late October — too late to force the cancellation of enough journals to offset inflation increases that have paralyzed the library's journal subscriptions budget. That money — the $50,000 — will have to be made up through "creative financing," as Hobrock said at Tuesday's meeting.

As it stands now, the library will receive $328,000 from a 1-percent increase in the OOE budget for 1998-99. The OOE funds colleges' non-salary expenditures. Of that money, one-half percent comes from the Legislature directly to the library. The other half-percent is coming from an OOE increase that would have been disbursed to the entire campus.



Provost James Coffman said the local decision to take an extra half-percent from the OOE could not have been done without the Legislature's approval of the new equipment fee, which takes $1 per credit hour of student money and matches it with $2 of state money. That tradeoff, Coffman said, allowed the academic deans to accept losing the half-percent OOE increase more easily.

"We worked with the deans on this, and they weren't excited about reducing OOE, which was already pathetic," Coffman said. Referring to suggestions that portions of the equipment fee could be used for library equipment, he said it's critical the equipment fee address other academic needs in teaching labs and technology-dependent departments.

Optimistically, another $300,000 could come from the KSU Foundation through a financing package tapping

See LIBRARY FUNDING, Page 8

Timeline of library funding solutions for 1997-98

May 1997 — Provost James Coffman establishes the Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the Twenty-First Century.

Sept. 12, 1997 — President Jon Wefald's State of the University Address is used as a forum for faculty concerns over the lack of adequate funding for Hale Library's 6,600 journal subscriptions.

Oct. 30, 1997 — Task force releases final report, suggesting long-term funding options and recommending a $500,000 print subscription freeze as well as a 5 to 20 - percent cut in journal subscriptions based on a sliding scale. Various funding shifts from other K-State cost centers also are recommended.

Feb. 2, 1998 — KSU Foundation announces a plan to provide what could amount to $300,000 per year in one-time money, culled through a complex arrangement involving new endowment monies.

March 6, 1998 — An 85-cent per-credit-hour student privilege fee, amounting to roughly $328,000 per year, failed by ten votes in Student Senate.

May 5, 1998 — University Library Committee meeting. At present, only about $300,000 in incresed Other Operating Expenditures money from the State is dedicated to the library's 1998-99 budget.

Spending projects approved

▸ CITY COMMISSION OKS CAPITAL IMPROVEMENTS, SPENDING UNTIL 2004.

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

After public comments and one successful amendment, Manhattan city commissioners unanimously passed an outline of significant spending projects for the next five years at their meeting Tuesday.

Commissioners approved 5-0 the Capital Improvements Program, which serves as a financial planning board for city spending projects until 2004, and the Capital Improvements Budget for 1999. The 1999 budget totals $12,957,350 and includes the Anderson Avenue expansion plan, improvements to Manhattan Regional Airport and the newly created business park.

Other improvements included in the 1999 budget are paid for with the City/University Tax Fund, which uses sales tax collected on campus to pay for projects that benefit the city and K-State. Money for the Anderson Avenue expansion, bicycle paths and racks, campus lighting, pedestrian safety, a pilot recycling project and the University Gardens was the fund's portion of the 1999 budget.

The commission rejected 3-2 an amendment by Commissioner Ed Klimek that would have moved the city's share of the cost of a new national guard armory higher on the priority list. The proposed $250,000 change would have planned for building a new armory in 2001-2002.

Klimek said the commission was obligated to make the construction of an armory a high priority because of the benefits of Fort Riley.

"We have an obligation with this being a military-supported town. Right now we have one of the worst national guard armories in the state, and I question the kind of support we show our military," Klimek said. "I feel we need to be a showcase for the military and not the opposite, as we are now."

Lt. Col. Robert Bloomquist of the Manhattan unit told commissioners that their support would ensure that state and federal funds would be secured for a new armory. But when asked if moving the armory project to a higher priority level would speed the process, he said armory plans are still long-term.

"With Bob Dole in Washington, getting this money quickly would've

American Institute of Baking offers experience for student bakers

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

The American Institute of Baking opened its doors in Manhattan twenty years ago.

Today, the building northeast of the K-State campus teaches an average of 60 students the fine points of bakery science each year.

Vice President of Information and Distance Learning Ronald Wirtz said AIB was moved to Manhattan primarily because of K-State's Department of Bakery Science and Management.

After studying several universities as a location for a new campus, Manhattan won out, Wirtz said.

"K-State came out on top as the location with which AIB ought to be associated," he said.

Manhattan is also a less expensive place for the students to live, Wirtz said, because K-State allows AIB students to live in the residence halls at the same daily rate as K-State students.

Because Manhattan is a smaller town than AIB's other locations, Wirtz said there are some problems.

"One is the difficulty of getting here from elsewhere," he said. "When you come to Manhattan, sometimes to people from outside the country or from the East Coast, it seems like the end of the earth."

Despite the location, AIB recruits many international students. The institute receives most of its money from companies that sponsor students who want to be promoted. Many of the companies are based internationally.

This year's international students include three from Guatemala and six from Mexico.

"We have people from all over the world come here," Director of Admissions Ken Embers said.

Though the school has several international students, Embers said the school has a low female enrollment — only 15 percent of the average 60 students.

"We would like to see more females involved in our courses," he said.

The average age of AIB students is 31.

Randy Kelly, 20, is the youngest student at AIB this semester. He said he decided to attend the institute because his father graduated from AIB.

"Ever since I was a little kid, I wanted to fall into the footsteps of my dad," he said.

Kelly said students attend class from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. In the morning, they attend a cake, bread, science or product-management lecture. They attend lab in the afternoon.

Kelly said the learning process is rigorous.

"It is difficult, especially for students who have family who aren't there," he said.

Wirtz said even students with doctoral degrees think the school is difficult, but students still graduate from the school with great experience.

"In a semester, students will get as much hands-on practice, we call it lab experience, as you would in a year of science courses," he said.

In some test-baking labs, students deliberately leave out ingredients and mix dough for too long or not long enough, Wirtz said.

"The reason behind doing that is to see what will happen, so when something like that occurs in a plant, they can identify it," he said.

Besides the 10-week course in maintenance and engineering and the 16-week course in baking science and technology, AIB also has nearly 3,000 students enrolled in correspondence courses.

Wirtz said AIB also teaches food safety by sending students to inspect plants to make sure they are following food-safety regulations.

"It's a really big part of what AIB does," he said.

For the past 1 1/2 years, students have been doing extensive research on how to make

New journalism scholarship to support up to 10 students every academic year

The largest scholarship ever given to the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications will total more than $50,000 annually.

The scholarship will support up to 10 journalism majors with full tuition and fees every year.

The Max E. and Jean Hollinger Scholarship was established by Max E. Hollinger to help journalism students who are interested in business issues, especially finance and insurance. The scholarship was set up in memory of his wife of 45 years, Jean, who died in 1995.

Max Hollinger graduated from the school in 1950 and said he wants to help financially others who are in the school.

"I asked about giving the scholarship because student fees are outrageous. When I was there, I used the old typewriters and took a course called typesetting," Max Hollinger said.

The idea and money for the scholarship go back to an investmnet class that Max Hollinger took as an undergraduate, he said. He started investing in stocks and bonds shortly after graduation.

He worked for Dow Jones and Company for 22 years, and it partially will match the scholarship funds each year with a $2,000 contribution.

The scholarship is available to all print and broadcast journalism majors, with other preference guidelines, and will be awarded each year starting with the current academic year. JILL BUTLER/Collegian

24 once-endangered species recovering; federal government aid soon to be lifted

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Declaring that the Endangered Species Act works, the administration says two dozen birds, plants and animals, including the bald eagle, are on their way to recovery and might soon be removed from the law's protection.

The proposal announced Tuesday by Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt marks the first time in the law's 25-year history that such a large number of species would be earmarked for removal from the endangered list, although it would be done over two years.

Babbitt is scheduled to trumpet the proposed removal of such species as the Peregrine falcon, the bald eagle, the Eastern timber wolf and the Aleutian Canada goose in a speech at a wildlife refuge in Massachusetts on Wednesday.

"We can now prove one thing conclusively. The Endangered Species Act works. Period," Babbitt said.

Critics of the 1973 law claim it not only has caused widespread economic harm to landowners but has shown little evidence of protecting species because only a handful over a quarter-century have recovered enough to be left on their own.

Abortion clinic bombing suspect wanted for questioning about '96 Olympic blast

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The FBI wants to question the man charged in the first fatal U.S. abortion clinic bombing about the 1996 Olympic blast and two other attacks in Atlanta. The bureau offered a $1 million reward and added him to its 10-most-wanted list Tuesday.

The reward for Eric Robert Rudolph was increased from $100,000 to get national attention, FBI Director Louis Freeh said.

Already charged with the Jan. 29 bombing of an abortion clinic in Birmingham, Ala., Rudolph is sought for questioning in three Atlanta bombings because "some similarities in the bombings ... indicate the possibility that the crimes are related," Freeh said.

The Atlanta blasts began at Centennial Olympic Park in July 1996, where one person was killed and more than 100 injured.

But officials stopped short of calling Rudolph a suspect in the Atlanta cases because there is not enough evidence to charge him with those attacks.

Microsoft corporate executive attempts to halt congressional antitrust legislation

NEW YORK — What's good for Microsoft is good for America.

So sayeth Bill Gates.

In a pro-Microsoft event laced with patriotic superlatives, the software maker's chairman said Tuesday that any attempt to block the mid-May release of its new Windows 98 software would hurt the most vibrant industry in the economy.

"It would be like telling GM they cannot come out with any new cars this fall," Gates said amid speeches from fellow high-tech leaders and a demonstration of Windows 98's features.

"No industry is doing more to move America forward," he said.

The splashy event orchestrated by Microsoft was part of a last-ditch effort to sway antitrust officials from taking action that would delay the software's mid-May release.

But the event in some ways gave Microsoft's critics more ammunition to argue that the company's dominance in the technology industry has grown too great.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and had hearings earlier this year into Microsoft's business practices, accused the Redmond, Wash., company of twisting executives' arms.

"I cannot help but wonder how many of these executives are on that stage because they truly want to be," Hatch said on the Senate floor Tuesday.

"It strikes me as curious that it was only after calls from Microsoft that many of these individuals saw fit to sign letters and make public appearances."

The event widened the fault lines in the debate about what action, if any, should be taken against the world's largest maker of personal computer software.

About a dozen states are expected to decide by mid-May whether to take action separate from the Justice Department, which has charged Microsoft with using its dominance as a maker of operating software to shut out rivals illegally. Microsoft wants to continue integrating new features into its software, such as the Internet browser it plans to weave into Windows 98.

Albright orders Israel to move its troops from West Bank before Clinton mediation

LONDON — It now takes two hands to count U.S.-sponsored Mideast meetings that have ended without result in the past two years.

At the latest one Tuesday in London, an exasperated Secretary of State Madeleine Albright set a deadline for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to accept Washington's compromise proposal. The plan calls for an Israeli troop withdrawal from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank beyond the 27 percent already handed over.

If he agrees by next Monday, then President Clinton is ready to preside over the ceremonial launching of talks between Israel and the Palestinians on the final phase of the 1993 Oslo accord — a permanent peace agreement, Albright told a news conference.

If Netanyahu balks, then "we will have to re-examine our approach to the peace process," Albright said. She did not specify what the Clinton administration might do differently, except that it would not abandon its role as mediator.

One option is to make the U.S. initiative public and openly blame Israel for the failure of the peace talks, a step advocated by Palestinian negotiators.

Angry Indonesians trash storefronts, hurl rocks at riot police in protest of inflation

MEDAN, Indonesia — Flipping over cars and hurling rocks at police, thousands of rioters furious about price hikes rampaged in northern Indonesia on Tuesday in the worst outbreak of violence since the country's economy buckled last year.

Helmeted police officers fired in the air to ward off mobs of looters who set fire to two homes and 14 cars and pelted hundreds of storefronts with stones, residents said.

Witnesses said several dozen people were injured, but there was no official count. At least 94 people were in police custody.

While the government was buoyed by another $7 billion from the International Monetary Fund — the fruits of its decision to phase out some subsidies — Tuesday's unrest is a painful reminder that the economic pain is becoming too much for many Indonesians to bear.

Yet, unlike student protesters who fought police on two campuses in Jakarta on Tuesday, the rioters were more focused on economic survival and directed little of their rage at President Suharto, a former army general whose authority remains firm after three decades in power. Most of the students believe Suharto's downfall is the only way to ensure a more open political system.

Pentagon requests reversal of mine ban

▶ DEFENSE OFFICIALS SAY MINES USEFUL TO KEEP PEACE IN FOREIGN LANDS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Pentagon is seeking to reverse a moratorium on the use of antipersonnel land mines that was approved by Congress and signed by President Clinton in 1996, a spokesman said Tuesday.

The law bars U.S. use of land mines for one year, starting Feb. 12, 1999. It was passed in an effort to get the military to look for alternatives to land mines.

Defense Secretary William Cohen and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Henry H. Shelton, have written Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, expressing their concerns and seeking a waiver.

The ban is considered largely symbolic.

"It's the military's feeling — and they expressed this in the letter ... — that the moratorium would dramatically limit our ability to fight and win battles in places such as Korea," Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said at a Pentagon briefing.

"Obviously, a moratorium that takes place for one year ... runs contrary to the idea of giving the military time to transition away from antipersonnel land mines to some alternative," he said.

There is an exception in the moratorium for international borders and clearly identified demilitarized zones such as the zone between North and South Korea. Bacon noted the Korean zone is only several miles wide. The ban would prevent the military from using mines south of the zone to defend Seoul from attack.

Bacon said that instead of land mines, it would require 17,000 more troops, hundreds of tanks, aircraft and other weapons to defend the region between Seoul and the zone. There are some 36,000 U.S. forces stationed in South Korea.

"At a time when our forces are operating ... deploying from the United States to places like the (Persian) Gulf or Bosnia and continuing our deployments to Korea, ... it is an unacceptable risk to endure this moratorium next year. So they are asking Congress not to require them to move forward with the moratorium," Bacon said.

The United States is the only significant holdout on signing the Ottawa Treaty, which would ban all antipersonnel mines. More than 100 nations signed it in December.

Union to lose $19,288 because of Wildcat Card debt this year, more in 1999

ANDREW D. WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

The Wildcat ID Card Center is projected to lose $19,288 for fiscal year 1998, according to figures from the K-State Student Union.

Next year, it is predicted in the Union's budget that the center will lose even more — $72,007. The Union shoulders most of the financial burden of the cards, though other campus departments benefit from them.

From the circulation desk at Hale Library to the residence hall dining centers, the new card opens doors for students. But Campus Card Manager Don Becker said the program isn't expected to generate a profit yet.

"Most campus card centers at other universities are not revenue-generating," he said. "It is considered a service for the students."

Becker said the cards eventually will draw revenue, but not a significant amount.

"We are on a five-year plan," he said. "In five years we should generate a little revenue, but no one expects us to be bringing in a lot of money. We expect the deficit, and we expect it to go down steadily in the next five years.

"Next year should be the high-water mark," Becker said of the projected $72,007 loss for fiscal year 1999.

The high deficit is caused by the cards' initial start-up cost, the high cost of upgrading technology and hiring staff to operate the card center, Becker said. Campus departments foot the bill for card-scanning hardware that's required to use the campus cards, but they don't pay other costs associated with the card.

"Departments on campus are assessed for the equipment they need," Becker said. "They were assessed that fee at the beginning of the year."

Patrick Carney, the 1997-98 Union Governing Board president, said the Union is left holding the bag financially for the new cards.

CARNEY

"There is a big difference between what we were told about the cost of the card and reality," he said. "The previous card cost only about $80,000 a year, and now it is in the budget for almost a quarter of a million dollars.

"If other departments are going to benefit from this, they should help pay for it, and some do," he said.

Carney said students, who pay $15 when they receive their ID card, shouldn't be forced to contribute any more money to the program. But when the card center loses money, the Union picks up the tab; the Union budget is funded by a student privilege fee.

"Students already pay their share when they buy it for $15," Carney said. "With the Union absorbing all of the cost, all students end up paying through the Union privilege fee. Students have already bought into the system."

Carney said if departments that use the card don't start paying more for the service, the financial burden will increase.

"If the athletic department benefits from the card, then they should pay back into it," he said.

"Before long, the Union will buckle under from the weight of their financial obligations to the university."

Despite the high cost of the cards, departments are benefiting from them. Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said Hale Library already has incorporated the card into its daily use.

HOBROCK

"We currently use the card for circulation, copying and fine payment," Hobrock said. "We are looking into using it for printing and for access to the certain parts of the library, sort of like what some hotels use."

Hobrock said that the library has not been contacted about sharing the cost of the cards.

"We have not heard anything like that," he said. "I hope we will not have to pay."

Bob Burgess, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said his department uses the Wildcat Card for access to dining centers and for late-night access to residence halls.

"We want to work with others on campus to make the card better. We are looking at a lot of different ideas on how to use the cards best," he said. "If we can increase the usage of the cards, we can increase the money flow."

Becker said the cost of producing the card might be high, but student feedback has been good.

"We have enjoyed the success the card has had," he said. "Students see it as a big convenience, despite the cost."

KSU Stadium expansion plans cause confusion

In a confusing move, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics showed conceptual drawings of the expansion plan for KSU Stadium to potential donors Thursday.

The drawings included added luxury boxes near student seating on the east side of the stadium instead of the west side.

What is confusing is that the athletic department is trying to sell conceptual ideas to donors even before the architects, HOK Sports Facilities Group of Kansas City, Mo., have finalized the designs.

While there is a need for urgency in the search for donors, the athletic department should not be banking on concepts or having donors bank on those concepts until it has given the architects ample time to design the expansion.

There is also concern about any radical changes being made to the stadium, even if they are preliminary. The new drawings are quite different from the original expansion plan that was presented to students last fall before they defeated a referendum vote to help fund the project.

While neither the athletic department nor HOK should feel obligated to design strictly what was in the original plan, there should be some form of communication with fans if radical changes such as moving luxury boxes are a possibility.

The athletic department should garner input from those fans who will be affected by such changes.

There also should be dialogue with all of those who are helping to support the expansion — whether they be season ticket holders, purchasers of luxury boxes or even students.

To some extent, that is what happened when the athletic department showed the conceptual drawings to potential donors. But it's imperative that all parties stay involved and that the athletic department emphasizes that any drawings are only possibilities.

The expansion is considered state-funded because of the process used to sell the $16 million bond. It must be approved by numerous planning agencies before the expansion can begin.

It's vital, then, that K-State fans interested in the expansion are given their rights to be kept informed on its progress.

KSU Mad Lib gives students opportunity to voice opinions

I wrote this column for you. Yes, you.

This one's for all of you who wish you had your voice in the Collegian. This time you won't have to listen to paragraphs upon paragraphs of mindless jabbering or hefty opinions. This time, you decide what's in the paper. I've concocted a little Mad Lib, fill-in-the-blank column for all of you creative Collegian readers.

VIEWPOINT

DAVID FAIRBANKS
David is a senior in mass communications. You can send e-mail to David at jolfyd@ksu.edu.

When you get to a blank, just fill in the word of your choice. This is your chance to shape a column to fit your standards. You can vent built-up aggression or commend someone for a job well done. It's all up to you.

There are a few rules, however. We can't have people using improper grammar so just follow the word-choice specifications. (Adj) equals adjective, (Adv) equals adverb, (N) equals noun and (V) equals verb. Now that you know the rules, let's get started on writing your column. Have fun and remember, this is a no-holds-barred disclosure of your opinion.

Speak your mind and share with your friends. It's been a wonderful semester working for all of you. Good luck and take care of yourselves.

K-STATE: OUR SCHOOL, OUR HOME

Ah yes, K-State, the home of the Wildcats. It's a place where purple and white stand for (N)_____ and (N)_____. It's a place where students of all different types can get a(n) (Adj)_____ education. It's the pursuit of that education that brings us all together.

From the (Adj)_____ men and women in the greek system who (Adv)_____ pursue the goal of becoming (Adj)_____ people, to the independent students who strive for a(n) (Adj)_____ sense of (N)_____, K-State is their home.

It doesn't matter that some people live (Adv)_____ in their (Adj)_____ residence-hall rooms on campus. It doesn't matter that others choose to live in (Adj)_____-priced houses with (Adj)_____ people for landlords. On the same note, it doesn't matter that still others choose to partake in the services a(n) (Adj)_____ apartment complex has to offer. What does matter is that we are all here (V)_____ and (V)_____ in our own individual way. The fact we all can express our own individuality while working toward a common goal is the (N)_____ that makes college such a(n) (Adj)_____ time.

We should be thankful that K-State allows each and every one of us to live (Adv)_____. It even gives us the chance to be a(n) (Adj)_____ part in the decisions that affect us all.

Take Student Governing Association, for example. This is an association where (Adj)_____ students can (V)_____ and (V)_____ the rules we must all live by. Every Thursday night, senators from around campus meet to (V)_____ pertinent issues, (V)_____ legislation and serve as the (Adj)_____ leaders of this campus. Without them, we would all be (N)_____.

That's what it's all about, isn't it? Students taking care of students is one of K-State's selling points.

An example of such students are the (Adj)_____ people who work for Parking Services. Each time I see one of those students giving out tickets to fellow students, I think, "Gee, those people are a real (N)_____ to this university." In fact, I think I'll tell them how I feel the next time I see one of them. I'll say, "Hey friend, I really appreciate the (Adj)_____ service you're performing for all of us. You're a prime example of what every (N)_____ should be like. Thanks for all the good work."

My thoughts on K-State would not be complete if I didn't include the people who work to inform and entertain us all. I'm of course talking about that (N)_____ of a paper, the Collegian, and that (Adj)_____ radio station, KSDB-FM 91.9. (N)_____ is the first thing that comes to my mind when I think about these K-State watchdogs.

DB92 is always "On the Cutting Edge" of (N)_____. Its news is very (Adj)_____ and the (Adj)_____ music the disc jockeys play always makes me (V)_____. That's what makes DB92 such a(n) (Adj)_____ station.

And what about the Collegian, with its (Adj)_____ reporters and columnists? This paper proves time and time again that it deserves all the (N)_____ it receives. The articles (Adv)_____ have mistakes and are (Adv)_____ biased. The columns never cease to address (Adj)_____ issues and are always (Adv)_____ to read. One columnist I'd like to point out is that (N)_____ of a writer, David Fairbanks. His columns always are full of (N)_____ and (Adj)_____ opinions. Reading one of his columns is like (phrase of choice)_____.

Ah yes, K-State: A place where students work together, play together and strive together for a common goal. It's the students who make this place what it is. So pat yourself on the back if you're a student. You are what makes it all happen. You are the future. You are K-State.

INTRODUCING TIMOTHY SMRCKA

K-State's most important student to spend summer researching campus issues

As the academic year crashes lightly to a close and graduating seniors scurry off to Corporate America, there is one K-State honor student whose summer work might prove to be of utmost importance to the continuing traditions of K-State.

He's not some flashy Student Senate type. He also has no respectable political office. No athlete is he. Not even a significant other shares this student's time.

But there is one thing Timothy Smrcka, a native of south central Kansas and a junior in political science, does hold dear to his heart: his summer job working with the National Society of Homogeneity, or NSH.

In Washington, D.C., mere blocks from the White House, the NSH is an organization that strives to maintain standards of every kind. Only recently, since the 1950s, has the organization ventured into politics, academia and social issues. Before that time, the NSH mainly concerned itself with product standards. Among its claims to fame: the 2-by-4 wood stud, the four-foot fluorescent light and the two-prong electrical plug.

Smrcka will be joining the NSH's Department of Educational Homogeneity, but will be working exclusively on a case study of K-State. When I spoke to him recently over coffee, he told me he hoped to bring some exciting information back to campus in August.

Smrcka: "Hey, bud. You know, it's like my buddies were telling me that I have to drink as many pitchers at Chance as pages in my thesis. That totally rocks!"

R.F.: "Tell me, Timothy, why did you come to K-State in the first place?"

Smrcka: "It's like, Cloud County Community College didn't have a political science department and they also wouldn't accept my 1.8 high school GPA. Somehow, I don't know if it was because my dad's a major player in the Catbackers or what, but K-State heavily recruited me. And now it just rocks. I'm gettin' jiggy with that."

R.F.: "Mr. Smrcka, could you please stop high-fiving the air?"

Among the issues Smrcka's research will address, the most interesting by far surely will prove to be his study of student life.

Already he has hypothesized that K-State's success is owed to a distinct mono-culture that has, for the large part, kept unimportant issues from becoming a campus conversation that would distract us all from ourselves.

For example, in order to convince the campus that university arts are not drastically underfunded, a large art museum — so symbolic of the university's full commitment to all arts — was opened a year ago and successfully has kept art students from demanding fair attention. It almost makes one forget we have poorly funded theater on campus.

There are also some controversial hypotheses Smrcka is considering, such as that the celebrated drinking culture that exists in Aggieville could be diverting students' attention from academic study. Or that poorly attended lectures, symposia and literary events might account for a student culture uninterested in enlightenment. Or perhaps the white men in suits running the university don't always have the best interests of the students in mind when making decisions. Smrcka definitely is pushing the envelope on these issues.

Smrcka also plans to venture into issues not always readily identifiable on campus. He said he planned to deliberate on the ways having a conventional mall with nonspecific, non-local stores contributes to a campus style. In his research, he plans to cite the proliferation on campus of clothing associated with such factory-supplied stores as American Eagle, Abercrombie and Fitch, the Gap and larger stores such as Dillard's as reasons students are attracted to K-State.

It might turn out that students — those one's and two's from the very best high schools — are not coming to K-State for our famed textile collection or our solid liberal arts education. It might be as simple as the safe prospect of cavorting for four years with racial and socioeconomic likes. That probably will never make the cut of the administration-financed, prospective-student newsletter The Campus Buzz.

Not everything Smrcka will accomplish this summer will prove worthwhile of campus attention.

But, the good news is that if he impresses his employers (and, we'll assume that's a given) there is the possibility the NSH would be interested in opening an institute on campus to study mono-cultures more closely.

This is indeed an exciting development and a great time to be a K-Stater. Or as Timothy Smrcka says, with no hint of the cynicism that invades the minds of so many learned collegiates, "My blood truly does run purple."

Victims may have to report hazing

▶ MARYLAND PROPOSAL WOULD PUNISH VICTIMS FOR REMAINING SILENT.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Hazing victims who fail to report abuse at the University of Maryland-Eastern Shore would be punished along with their abusers under a proposal now being considered, the university president said Tuesday.

President Delores Spikes said the policy change — which would surpass hazing restrictions at other schools in the University of Maryland System — is being eyed as a way to stop hazing at a school where five pledges at Kappa Alpha Psi were hospitalized this spring.

"How else are you going to break the cycle of hazing for generations and generations?" Spikes said. "The person being hazed has to accept some responsibility."

University administrators said that when pledges undergo hazing, whether they are injured or not, they go on to inflict that same punishment on future pledges once they become upperclassmen.

Last month, Maryland State Police said the beatings of five pledges with paddles and canes at Kappa Alpha Psi's UMES chapter resulted in the students being hospitalized with cuts and infections on their buttocks. One student underwent surgery to have gangrenous flesh removed.

The beatings occurred daily from Feb. 8 to April 4, said police and family members.

There have been no arrests. Spikes and police said some of the students who were beaten have refused to cooperate with authorities.

The university president said Tuesday there may be a grand jury investigation into the beatings. A grand jury would be able to subpoena the alleged victims and other witnesses — an authority the school's disciplinary system does not have.

Spikes has said that if the disciplinary system finds any students guilty of hazing the five pledges, she would suggest expulsion as a proper punishment.

Kappa Alpha Psi's activities at the Somerset County university have been suspended pending completion of the investigation.

The fraternity has been linked to hazing incidents at two other universities — including one last month at K-State where the father of a student said his son, Ernest Harris Jr., suffered kidney injuries so severe he will have to undergo dialysis.

Kappa Alpha Psi settled a $2.25 million lawsuit in December 1996 with the family of a man who died after a beating.

K-State officials oppose hazing proposal

JOE HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

The University of Maryland-Eastern Shore is considering a proposal that would penalize hazing victims who fail to report the abuse.

School officials at UMES are looking at the proposal as a way to combat hazing, after five Kappa Alpha Psi pledges were hospitalized in the spring.

The K-State chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi was suspended indefinitely last month after an apparent hazing incident left one member, Ernest L. Harris Jr., hospitalized in serious condition with kidney and back injuries.

Despite this recent incident, Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said he does not foresee any similar action being taken at K-State anytime in the near future.

"I don't want to say never, but I just don't see how it would work under our interest in due process," Bosco said.

Bosco said that besides having little chance of ever becoming a K-State policy, he didn't think the proposed plan would flourish at UMES, either.

"I don't think that it will work," Bosco said.

He said he expected failure for the proposal because it failed to address the topic in a way that would solve the problem, and it could just make the problem worse.

"Doesn't it also make the victim a victim twice?" Bosco said.

David Butts, president of Sigma Chi and senior in mechanical engineering, said he agreed the policy would penalize the victim too much.

"You'd be putting the victim in a kind of double jeopardy, punishing them a second time. You have to protect the victim some," Butts said.

John Gaither, president of FarmHouse and junior in agricultural economics, said he also saw a downside to the proposal but wasn't sure the policy was completely negative.

"I would look at it two ways," Gaither said. "On the plus side, it's a more powerful deterrent against hazing, because it puts increased responsibility on members not to condone it.

"But it's kind of a negative because in a way you're punishing the innocent party. I look at that like the person who's the victim of a crime being punished for what's happened to them."

Bosco said he recognizes the problem caused when victims refuse to stand up for themselves and turn in those guilty of hazing, but there are better ways to deal with the problem.

"I'd rather spend my time trying to educate people about what's acceptable and what's not acceptable as far as hazing," Bosco said. "I'd rather take my chances there."

Gaither said that because the majority of fraternities take no part in hazing, he didn't think such a policy would have much of an effect, but he said he still did think it would serve a purpose.

"I think it would be of little consequence to us, since we don't haze," Gaither said.

"But it should scare those who need to be scared.

"If anything, it's going to bring more focus to the issue. Whether it would be effective, I honestly don't know," he said.

No arrests have been made in either the UMES or K-State hazing incidents.

Harris was released from the hospital last week.

Royals get back on track with win against Devil Rays

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Tampa Bay is finally starting to play like an expansion team.

After a hot start that led to an expansion-record 12 wins in April, the American League's newest franchise has fallen upon hard times. The Devil Rays lost for the 12th time in 14 games Tuesday night when Kansas City snapped a three-game skid with a 4-2 victory.

"These guys, they showed you tonight we're not going to quit," Tampa Bay manager Larry Rothschild said. "We're just going to work harder. We will get through this and we'll be better after we get through it."

Dean Palmer's two-run single off Wilson Alvarez (3-4) capped a three-run fourth inning for the Royals, who would have had the same record as the Devil Rays (12-18) if they had lost.

Would that have been embarrassing to Royals manager Tony Muser?

"I'm still embarrassed about the last game," said Muser, referring to a 10-1 drubbing on Sunday by the New York Yankees.

"Actually, I know that Tampa Bay is a very dangerous team," Muser said. "They are not what you think of expansion teams in the past. They can pitch, and they can play defense."

Royals starter Hipolito Pichardo (2-2) left after splitting a callous on the thumb of his right hand while pitching to Quinton McCracken leading off the sixth inning. Pichardo said he did it on a split-finger pitch in the fifth.

"After two pitches in the sixth, I couldn't throw again," he said.

"The doctor said maybe I'll need 10 days. In spring training, I did the same thing."

A Royals spokesman said no decision on whether to put Pichardo on the disabled list would be made until today.

Jeff Montgomery pitched the ninth for his sixth save in seven chances, giving up a leadoff homer to Paul Sorrento.

Alvarez (3-4) lost his third consecutive start, giving up four runs and 10 hits in five innings with six strikeouts and one walk.

Kansas City trailed 1-0 in the fourth when Jeff Conine hit an RBI double in his first at-bat of the season.

Conine, who had a lower abdominal strain, was activated Monday after spending the first month at extended spring training.

"It was great to get the cobwebs out and be back out there," Conine said. "I was getting really frustrated."

Palmer connected on the next pitch for a 3-1 lead, and Shane Mack added an RBI double in the sixth.

Tampa Bay had gone ahead in the second on Miguel Cairo's RBI single.

U.S. team goes with veterans for 1998 World Cup soccer

NEW YORK — The U.S. World Cup team has experience — and age.

Sixteen of the 20 players picked for the roster Tuesday will be older than 25 by this summer's tournament, and five will top 30.

In 1990, when the Americans qualified for the first time in 40 years, the oldest player was 27 and four topped 25. In 1994, there were just eight older than 25.

"We have a great mix of veteran players that bring an enormous amount of experience, combined with some younger players ... that provide us some hope for the future," U.S. coach Steve Sampson said during a telephone news conference. "I think we're even more mature and more experienced than the '94 squad."

This U.S. team, which starts practice Monday in San Diego, has an average age of 28, up from 26.4 in 1994 and 24.2 in 1990, when the Americans were the youngest team in the tournament.

While the Americans have more experience, they might not have the legs to advance from a tough first-round group that includes European champion Germany, Yugoslavia and Iran.

Just 12 players are holdovers from the 1994 roster and just three remain from the 1990 team: forward Eric Wynalda, defender Marcelo Balboa and goalkeeper Kasey Keller.

Midfielder Tab Ramos, a veteran of both tournaments, probably will fill one of two spots still vacant on the 22-man roster, which won't be finalized until it is submitted to FIFA on June 2.

"None of our players can carry the team through a World Cup single-handedly," Sampson said. "It is very important that we take on the attitude of a blue-collar team, working hard in attack and hard in defense.

"It is very important to me that the entire country and the entire world see a team that works their tail off, and that demands more than effort, it requires a single-mindedness and togetherness that will lead this team to succeed."

Holdovers from the 1994 roster include Roy Wegerle and Wynalda at forward; Cobi Jones, Claudio Reyna and Ernie Stewart in midfield; Marcelo Balboa, Mike Burns, Thomas Dooley and Alexi Lalas on defense; and Brad Friedel and Juergen Sommer in goal.

Newcomers include defenders Jeff Agoos and Eddie Pope; midfielders Chad Deering, Frankie Hejduk, Brian Maisonneuve and Joe-Max Moore; and forwards Brian McBride and Preki Radosavljevic.

Frank Myers Field closes with 12-run loss to WSU

It wasn't a storybook ending at Frank Myers Field.

The rain stayed away for a while, but not long enough to halt Wichita State's bats as the Shockers beat K-State 17-5 Tuesday night.

After a 45-minute rain delay in the sixth inning, Shocker designated hitter Tim Hayes hit a towering two-run homer to right field. The shot capped a four-run sixth and triggered a six-run seventh, instituting the mercy rule on the Wildcats.

"They got the four-run inning and then I think we just quit," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "We let the game get out of touch."

However, K-State's defense couldn't get any touch as it tallied six errors on the night, tying a season high.

"Their hitters just dominated our pitchers," Clark said. "Throw bad defense on top of that and it's a bad combination. They were just mental mistakes and you can't have mistakes against a good team like that."

Wichita State (45-5) scored early and often, crossing the plate in each of the first four innings. The Shockers got on the board first with one run in the first and added three more in the second off two Cats errors.

▶ Rematch
K-State will get a second shot at the Shockers at 7 tonight at Tyler Field in Wichita.

"The one thing we have to do is pitch and play defense, and we didn't do either of those tonight and that's why you get a score like that," Clark said.

Shocker hitters broke the shell off starting pitcher Brandon Peck with four of their first five hits going for extra bases, all doubles. However, with the bases loaded, Peck ended the second-inning rally by tagging out Brian Preston on the first-base line.

K-State (20-28) put up some numbers in the bottom half of the second. Left fielder Brian Bobier led off with a single to left. Right fielder Andy Silva walked, putting a man on first and second. Shortstop J.D. Loudabarger laid a bunt down the third-base line and reached on an error by the pitcher, scoring Bobier. Bobier went two-for-three in the game with an RBI and a run scored.

CLARK

Loudabarger came up big again in the fourth, knocking in Bobier with a double down the left-field line. First baseman Chet Savage, who singled earlier in the inning, scored on a wild pitch making the score 7-3.

The Cats inched their way back into the game again in the fifth as third baseman Josh Marn hit a home run to right field, his ninth of the season, which extended his hitting streak to nine games. Bobier then hit a blooper past a diving Jeff Ryan in center field, scoring designated hitter Quinn Cravens to make the score 7-5.

"Everything was going good, but I think we just quit," Clark said.

"They made a run, we answered and then they made their run and we didn't answer, and then I thought we just didn't compete and let the game get out of hand."

Peck ate the loss for the Cats, pitching three innings and giving up seven runs, five of which were earned. Senior David Meares came on in relief in the third, allowing seven runs as well, six of them earned. Meares also struck out three batters.

Shocker starter Brandon Sloan earned the win, improving his record to 5-1. Sloan gave up all five of K-State's runs.

The two teams are back in action at 7 tonight at Tyler Field in Wichita. Chad Cosens (1-1) will get his second start on the mound for K-State.

5 years of college and I learned 1 thing: KU always falters in the NCAAs

Quiz: What's the motivation of a fifth-year senior to write a sports column when graduation is only 10 days away?

Answer: In three weeks, he'll get to drive back to K-State to pick up his fat $17.50 paycheck. CHA-CHING!

Speaking of astronomical numbers, try working this equation. "SportsCenter" airs a total of nine hours a day. Let's see — take that times 365 days in a year, then multiply that by five years of college, and you get a cool 16,425 hours of stats and highlights. That's more than 684 days spent worshiping the likes of Dan Patrick and Peter Gammons. That's 1-7/8 years in front of the tube. And that doesn't even include "NYPD Blue" reruns.

Even better, it's the source of some great memories in the past five years. More memories than Albert Belle can wave his middle finger at, more memories than Dennis Rodman can kick in the groin and more memories than Manny Dies can scare into jumping out of a window.

September 1993: "Why?" So read the cover of Sports Illustrated after Michael Jordan announced his retirement from the NBA. Perhaps SI should ask the same question about Pero Vasiljevic calling the police last week.

December 1993: My first taste of Hoosier basketball as a freshman at Indiana University. IU was coming off a huge upset of No. 1 Kentucky, Larry Bird is at the game, the Hoosiers win big and Bob Knight gets so mad at a player that he kicks him in the leg during a timeout. It doesn't get any better than that. The player was his own son, too.

March 1994: KU is stunned by Purdue in the third round of the NCAA Tournament.

October 1994: Thanks to the players' union, there's no World Series this year. Nevertheless, WIBW-TV rebroadcasts the 1985 Series in its entirety, allowing us to relive the darkest moment in the history of sports.

Even after nine years, Kansas City Royals announcer Denny Matthews still says Jorge Orta was safe at first.

March 1995: KU is stunned by Virginia in the third round of the NCAA Tournament.

May 1995: His team down six points with 8.9 seconds to go, Indiana Pacers guard Reggie Miller hits two three-pointers and two free throws to win Game 1 of a playoff series against the Knicks. The "choke" sign immediately becomes a universal gesture.

November 1995: K-State valiantly marches down the entire length of Wagner Field in the fourth quarter to take a late lead over Colorado, only to watch in disbelief as the Buffs come right back to score the game-winning touchdown. Collegian columnist Scott Fritchen punches no fewer than eight holes in various walls throughout the Delta Upsilon fraternity house.

March 1996: KU is stunned by Syracuse in the fourth round of the NCAA Tournament.

September 1996: A little-known college journalism student who once won the Topeka eighth-grade doubles tennis championship attempts to resurrect his fledgling career in K-State intramurals. Instead, he sets an amateur record for double faults in a devastating 10-1 defeat.

October 1997: On the last play of intramural flag football finals, DU quarterback Brandon Schmidtberger finds Tad Melichar in the end zone for the game-winning touchdown.

December 1997: Led by Michael Bishop and Darnell McDonald, K-State delivers an emphatic "in your face" to naysayers near and far with a 35-18 victory over Syracuse in the Fiesta Bowl. (I beg your pardon. That's the "Tostitos" Fiesta Bowl).

March 1998: KU is stunned by Rhode Island in the second round of the NCAA Tournament. At what point will this no longer be stunning?

Pope responds to murders in Vatican

ASSOCIATED PRESS

VATICAN CITY — Moving quickly Tuesday to explain a bloody crime in their hallowed precincts, Vatican officials said a member of the pope's Swiss Guards was driven by bitterness about a reprimand and lack of recognition when he killed his commander, the commander's wife and then himself.

Pope John Paul II was "visibly sad" when told of the first multiple killings to take place inside Vatican City in centuries, and he sent a message of condolence to the family of Col. Alois Estermann.

Instead of a swearing-in ceremony for 40 new guards, where Estermann was to be honored today, the Vatican will have a funeral for him and his wife, Gladys Meza Romero, in St. Peter's Basilica. Estermann had been named commander of the guards just hours before his death.

Vatican officials said Estermann and his wife were shot Monday night at their apartment, just off St. Peter's Square, by Cedrich Tornay, a 23-year-old noncommissioned officer who then turned his semiautomatic pistol on himself.

Tornay, a three-year member of the corps, had given the Vatican a letter to be passed on to his family 90 minutes before the 9 p.m. killings, Vatican spokesman Joanquin Navarro-Valls said.

While he did not reveal the letter's contents, the spokesman said Tornay felt unappreciated and bitter that he wasn't going to receive a decoration at the swearing-in ceremony. "He complained to his colleagues that he was not included in the list."

The guard also was outraged by a Feb. 12 letter of reprimand from Estermann for staying out all night, the spokesman said.

"It was a fit of madness in a person with very peculiar psychological characteristics," Navarro-Valls said. He said Tornay had a character that "let things build up to explode without logic," though he had shown no signs of psychological problems until now.

Recruits do not undergo psychological testing, but are chosen through a complex method that involves Swiss parishes and dioceses, Navarro-Valls said.

He ruled out other motives, seeking to quash speculation that it was a crime of passion or linked to Estermann's appointment.

He described the Estermanns as a model couple and said Tornay only recently had broken up with an Italian girlfriend.

The news conference at which Navarro-Valls explained the deaths came only 12 hours after the shootings, and he said he sought to clear up any mystery about the deaths.

The Vatican tightly controls the release of information and closely limits access inside its walls.

It has been stung by criticism it was not forthcoming in recent events, such as the Vatican bank scandal in the late 1970s and the death of Pope John Paul I in 1978.

Only a few hours before the killings, Pope John Paul II had named Estermann, 43, to lead the Swiss Guards, an elite, 100-member corps of Swiss Catholic men founded in 1506 to help with papal security and perform ceremonial duties.

Elementary students to perform original opera, 'One Voice'

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

Since November, 24 students have been working on an opera for an hour each day.

But the students aren't enrolled at K-State. They aren't even in high school.

Fourth- and fifth-grade students at Roosevelt School, a Manhattan elementary school, will perform "One Voice," an original opera written and composed by the students, at 7:30 tonight and Thursday night at the school.

Music teacher Susanna Parker said the students wrote the music and auditioned for the parts.

Fourth-grader Lindsay Arthur said her classmates have learned from being involved with the production. She said they have been able to perform roles beyond just composing and acting, such as doing carpentry and public relations.

Arthur helped with public relations for the opera and also will act in the performance.

"It has been a lot of fun. I've learned a lot," she said. "I'm not as shy on stage anymore. I just go up there and do what I have to do."

The modern-day opera, set in the desert, is about a god, Kokopelli, who plays songs on his flute in order to teach lessons about life. Kokopelli meets many children and desert animals who are alone and teaches them that being alone is not so bad, Parker said.

Arthur plays a blind girl who spends much of her time by herself. She said no one pays attention to her character, but she is strong enough to handle it.

"The kids are there to learn it's OK to be alone," Arthur said.

The opera has nine songs, all written by the students, and lasts about 40 minutes, Parker said.

The school began this program four years ago, after sending Parker and Roger Gibson, the fourth- and fifth-grade teacher, to train with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. This is the fourth year the school has written an original opera.

Library funding requires tradeoffs into new endowments. All said and done, this could increase the library's 1998-99 budget by nearly $650,000.

"That's a major breakthrough," President Jon Wefald said. "We're getting the entire university to agree to give part of their OOE to support the library."

The members of the library committee, who are charged with overseeing the implementation of the now-dissolved task force's funding solutions, voiced concern at their meeting that not enough was being done to solve the shortfall.

Student privilege fee still controversial

Mark Weiss, chairman of the committee, said the university is far short of its goal of $1.5 million, which was identified by the task force as a short-term solution.

"The task force recommended $1.5 million," Weiss said. "We took that seriously. I'd like to know how we're going to get back to that number."

That solution would have included a $2 per-credit-hour student privilege fee. An 85-cent per-credit-hour fee was considered by Student Senate earlier this semester but did not pass. Administrators and some committee members said they are optimistic that a fee could become a reality next year.

Hobrock said, "Our reading of the world out there is that this is a very common way of funding the library."

He said the library plans to ask students to consider a fee again next year, and he said he thought the fee failed this year because students didn't think the university was as persuasive as it could have been with the Legislature.

Wefald, along with other administrators, is mindful of the changing nature of Senate. Although, he is always careful to remind faculty that Senate has independent powers to set its own fees.

"Every Student Senate is different," Wefald said. "They might change their minds next year."

Some committee members said they are adamant about not considering a student fee, arguing that a library is central to the university and should be funded as a part of tuition.

Peter Knupfer, associate professor of history and committee member who said he staunchly opposes a student fee, said a student fee to fund more electronic-retrieval systems does not solve long-term funding problems.

"The students need to understand it's much easier to destroy a collection than create a collection," Knupfer said. "If we destroy parts of the collection that are not offered electronically, we're creating gaps in the collection."

European-style breads with American wheat and processors. They have applied what they found to making authentic French breads.

"They're turning out some of the best bread I've ever had here," Wirtz said.

AIB welcomes any K-State graduate in a food major to attend its school, and K-State graduates in food-related disciplines are eligible for full scholarships, Embers said. Two full scholarships are available, and K-State graduates are given priority, he said.

Students who want to attend AIB must have two years' experience in the baking industry or complete a 50-lesson correspondence course.

Embers said graduate students from K-State's baking school have many job opportunities if they attend AIB.

"These people go on to jobs as product development people because they know both the theory, the abstract part, the chemistry part, and they know the functional-operational part, which is what they learn here," Embers said.

AIB is the only school in the world that teaches the functional-operational aspect of baking.

Embers said AIB doesn't compete with K-State in any way.

"We complement what they do," he said.

helped," he said. "Back then, he could push some things in. But things have changed in D.C., and the way we operate business is more on the long term. This will be a three- to five-year plan for the armory."

Commissioners who voted against the amendment were concerned with the cuts proposed by Klimek to come up with the extra $250,000, namely, reductions in planned equipment replacement, such as dump trucks and fire department support vehicles.

Commissioner Karen McCulloh said she couldn't support the amendment if leaving the armory project in the CIP's appendix would satisfy the Army's desire for a financial commitment from the city of Manhattan.

"If we've been assured that leaving it in the appendix shows we are interested, we can move it from the appendix next year if the time is right and we have more tax dollars," she said. "I would be very concerned about moving scheduled equipment replacement from the list, because then you end up spending more money on maintenance on older equipment."

Only one amendment to the CIP was approved by the commission, which added a pollution prevention study and an indoor facility study to the list of 1999 projects.

Commissioners said they hoped the indoor facility study, which should gauge the need and use of public space in Manhattan, would determine the need for a new armory and how it should be designed.

COUPLED TOGETHER

▸ K-STATE COUPLE TO LEAVE MARK ON MANHATTAN ARTISTIC SCENE.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Walking into any campus art show in the past three years, you likely would have bumped into artists Rich Bergen and Nickie Mitchell.

The two master's of fine arts students are inseparable fixtures on the local arts scene, whether holding sway at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, the Willard Gallery or a hot night of jazz at Auntie Mae's Parlor. Come May 16, the two will have finished their master's degrees and will be headed to Salina. But more on that later.

Artistically, they could not be more different. Mitchell, whose work is featured in the Union art Gallery until Friday, works in ceramics and creates small landscapes that manage to squeeze in vast expansions of space. Bergen is characteristically a pop artist, obsessed with the form and meaning of toy jacks. You might have noticed his "Lumberjack" prominently displayed behind Anderson Hall as part of his MFA show last week.

Art Review

▸ Exhibit info
An exhibition of ceramics by MFA candidate Nickie Mitchell is in the Union art gallery until Friday. Gallery hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

"We talk about our work together a lot," Bergen said, sitting in the Union Stateroom next to Mitchell, who was sipping iced coffee and dealing with the stress of preparing her show and thesis for this week. "We brainstorm, sort of like the old days sitting around the coffee shops like Toulouse Lautrec or Van Gogh."

Mitchell said the two "look to each other for support and inspiration. You can't work in a vacuum. Since we live together and spend so much time together, we work through our struggles together."

The two met in the early 1990s at Wichita State University — Mitchell as an undergraduate and Bergen as a beginning MFA candidate. After Mitchell graduated, the two enrolled in the MFA program at K-State and have become such a close couple they have the tendency to finish each other's sentences.

Both admit to having fathers who encouraged them to learn to see as artists and to enjoy the physical and cultural qualities of their environment. Mitchell is not a native Kansan, having moved throughout the country during her childhood and a marriage that lasted eighteen years. Bergen is the son of Salina, Kan., sculptor Richard Bergen, the artist who has struggled for more than a decade to get his sculpture of an American Indian, "Ad Astra," placed on the dome of the capitol in Topeka. His sister, Lori, is an assistant professor of journalism at K-State.

As a result, Bergen said perhaps his greatest debt to his father is perseverance, though there is much more to their relationship.

"I never was a big troublemaker as a kid. I'm still that way," Bergen said. "However, not that I don't bend the rules. That's the job of the artist — to break boundaries."

Although Mitchell's father died more than a decade ago, she said Bergen's father reminds her of the essence of hers — a man of total honesty with an intense creative drive.

"Both of our parents were creative," Mitchell said. "My dad forced us kids to see. When we would travel he would tell us to wake up and look out the window, because you never know when you're going to be back there."

IVAN KOZAR/Collegian

AN EXHIBITION OF CERAMICS BY MASTER'S OF FINE ARTS CANDIDATE NICKIE MITCHELL IS IN THE UNION ART GALLERY UNTIL FRIDAY. THE GALLERY HOURS ARE 8 A.M. TO 5 P.M. MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY.

The two said they don't plan to stop their support of local arts with their move to Salina. They will be helping the elder Bergen on some large commissions and establishing studios themselves. There may be the possibility of opening a gallery.

Looking back on the past three years in Manhattan, both offer some criticism of the local scene, but mainly pleasure.

"In the art classes I teach, I'm amazed at these students who are from small farming communities and yet they have an interest in the arts," Mitchell said. "As far as the community as a whole, the Manhattan Center for the Arts is a pretty incredible endeavor for a community this size."

As for the Beach Museum, Mitchell said, "It would be wonderful if they would do something to promote other campus venues. One of these student's work in a campus gallery may some day end up in the museum — like Alan Shields."

Unlike the New York-based Shields, Mitchell and Bergen are committed firmly to the idea of working as artists in Kansas.

"It's not a very good idea — I know that," Bergen said. "I've grown up watching my dad try to survive and make it."

Although Salina is an hour's drive west from Manhattan, the two agree their local friendships and interests in the art scene will surely draw them to Manhattan next year.

As if anyone could keep them away.

Mercy Rule deserves to be best known band out of Nebraska

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

If there was any justice in this world, Lincoln, Neb.'s Mercy Rule would be the most well-known band to come out of Nebraska, not 311.

Perhaps with its new album, "The Flat Black Chronicles," Mercy Rule will achieve the success it deserves.

"The Flat Black Chronicles" was produced, recorded and mixed by Lou Giordano, best known for his work with Sugar and the Mighty Mighty Bosstones. As a result, the sound is stellar. It's raw yet polished at the same time.

Everything kicks off with "Underwhelmed," a Pixies-ish chunk of anthemic rock. Bassist and vocalist Heidi Ore's powerful voice soars over everything with her Ani DiFranco-meets-Kim Deal vocal style. I love the driving guitar and bass, which builds throughout the song.

The next track, "Spark," is sure to "spark" a ton of pogoing and dreaded moshing. This tune will make you bop along without even thinking about it. The alternating clean and distorted guitar tones are awesome.

"B4U" rocks along, and then, all of a sudden, a big ol' horn section comes out of left field and starts rockin' along too. It was definitely a surprise, but not a bad one. Guitarist Jon Taylor's use of feedback is stunningly good. "B4U" is a love song, but not in a conventional way.

If The Verve were an indie rock band from Nebraska, it might sound like Mercy Rule does on "In A Box." This tune features some cool strings and piano arrangements.

My favorite song on this compact disc has to be "KSUK," a pointed diatribe about the blandness of commercial alternative-rock radio. It also sounds a lot like Fugazi. The best lyric has to be "Kids in my hometown play better songs than you have played all day all year long." Right on.

"Break The Band" is another scathing attack, but this time it's about major labels and MTV. It deals with one-hit wonders who break up because their second album is a failure and they get dropped from their label. It's funny but not at the same time.

I just have to wonder if lyrics like "Just give me one good catchy song and I'll string you kids along" actually happened to Mercy Rule itself.

The biggest surprise on the album had to be the track called "Bob." It starts off with the sound of a Ford van or truck being started — my dad drives a Ford, so I know what it sounds like when the door is opened, I swear — and the radio flipped through stations to land on Mercy Rule rocking out.

▸ See the band for yourself
Mercy Rule is part of KSDB FM-91.9's Springfest '98 Saturday in Memorial Stadium.

It's absolutely brilliant, because it sounds like you're actually listening to it as you drive along. You can hear the van upshift and accelerate. It ends with the van being shut off and the person leaving. It sounds as if it was actually a recording of the tape being played in a van. Oh, yeah, it seems to be about losing a friend or boyfriend.

The last listed track on the album is "Simple Word," which is one rockin' tune. The huge sound fills the room. It's hard to believe Mercy Rule is only a trio.

Ore spits out venomous lyrics like "When I was younger, I thought I was fat and ugly too. It took me too damn long to figure out that none of that was true." It sure doesn't seem like it's 6:08 long.

There's an added surprise for those who listen past "Simple Word." There's an unlisted track that is absolutely hysterical. It's a goofy song about being in Mercy Rule and going on tour.

Ore sings about how they write songs, and when the loud chorus part kicks in, she sings, "This is the part that gets loud, this is what we always do." And then she sings about going on tour and playing crappy clubs and so on. It's a fun end to one great record.

I give "The Flat Black Chronicles" four out of five stars. This surprised the hell out of me.

Mercy Rule is one of the featured bands at KSDB FM-91.9's Springfest '98 on Saturday. Judging by the performance on this album, Mercy Rule could be one of the best live shows of the entire day, so get out and see them before they hit it big. Guaranteed.

El Niño to blame for lettuce shortage

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOYNTON BEACH, Fla. — From coast to coast, El Niño is making it easy for restaurant diners to decide whether it will be the house salad or the Caesar.

Heavy rains last February wiped out the romaine lettuce crop on many farms in California, forcing some eateries — including all 4,500 Wendy's restaurants nationwide — to drop Caesar salads from the menu. Other restaurants are managing to find romaine, but they're passing on the higher cost to customers.

Ana Pava said she had hoped for a Caesar salad but settled for one made with iceberg lettuce at a Wendy's in West Palm Beach. She said she regretted it.

"I'm not a vegetable eater, but Caesar is a salad that gives people a sauce, so I can eat it," she said. As for the iceberg salad on her tray, she said, "I got it, but I'm not going to eat it. I'll give it to my husband."

Like many other restaurants, Centro at the Mill, a Tuscany-style Italian spot in Greenwich, Conn., has been getting by for the past week by using other types of lettuce, such as red leaf or baby greens. For those Centro guests who insist on romaine, there's a $2 surcharge.

California supplies nearly 80 percent of the nation's romaine. Heavy rains delayed planting or killed seedlings, and many of the crops that did survive were attacked by fungus because of the standing water.

While other types of lettuce also were affected, romaine was the hardest hit.

The result: Wholesale prices of romaine shot from about $10 a case to $50, according to the California Department of Food and Agriculture.

Ken McConnell, manager of culinary development for the Ruby Tuesday restaurant chain at its headquarters in Birmingham, Ala., said a restaurant manager from New Jersey found a case of romaine for $72. He normally pays $12.

"And he still wanted to buy it," McConnell said. The restaurant manager got the OK.

The shortage should ease in a few weeks as the next crop of lettuce makes its way to stores and restaurants. Romaine usually takes three to four months to grow.

In the meantime, Wendy's customers will see signs at the cash registers and drive-through windows explaining why Caesar salads aren't available. At the 370 Ruby Tuesdays around the country, signs on each table announce "El Niño Strikes Again!" and explain why the chicken Caesar — the restaurant chain's most popular salad entree — isn't on the menu.

Jeff Frost, a manager-in-training at the Ruby Tuesday in Boynton Beach, said, "It's just one more thing that people are blaming on El Niño."

Local businesses cope with Romaine shortage

▶ PRICES SKYROCKET FOR AREA MERCHANTS SERVING CAESAR SALADS.

AMANDA FINGER
Kansas State Collegian

El Niño has been blamed for several environmental and ecological problems. Now a nationwide shortage of romaine lettuce can be added to the list.

Manhattan grocery stores, Wendy's and the K-State Student Union Stateroom all have experienced problems with the quality of romaine lettuce.

Last February, many farms in California were damaged by heavy rains and mudslides. The damage was so extensive it forced Wendy's nationwide to drop Caesar salads, which are made from romaine lettuce, from the menu because of drastic price increases.

Kathy Barlow, general manager of the Wendy's on Third Street in Manhattan, said her restaurant should be selling Caesar salads in a few weeks, hopefully by the end of May.

Barlow said the price of romaine lettuce finally is beginning to fall, when only a few days ago the price had increased as much as $10 per case.

She also said the prices of tomatoes and iceberg lettuce have increased.

Derek Woods, an employee of Food 4 Less, said the fruits and vegetables they receive also have been affected but not as much as the romaine lettuce crops.

Woods said it is not a problem keeping lettuce in stock, but the quality is really poor, which increases the price customers must pay.

He said store prices have increased from 98 cents per head of lettuce to $2.98 per head of lettuce, but he said the prices should begin to fall soon.

Barb Depew, food production manager at the Union, said prices have increased for her as well.

"Prices go up every year, but I haven't ever seen a price jump like this," Depew said, regarding an increase of more than $20 per case of romaine lettuce.

Depew said the shipment of lettuce the Union received last week was muddy and of poor quality.

As a solution to this problem, Depew said she is trying to find alternatives to the use of romaine lettuce in many of the menu items. More prepackaged items that contain lettuce are being purchased to save money.

She said she is encouraging more spinach dishes, adding more vegetables to the tossed salads and substituting kale for garnish.

"We are doing this for the customer's benefit, so we don't have to increase prices," Depew said.

As for the question of El Niño's involvement in the shortage of lettuce, she said "Everything's blamed on El Niño."

Ceremony pays tribute to President Reagan

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With his name already chiseled on buildings, bridges, highways and an airport, former President Ronald Reagan collected a colossal tribute Tuesday when the nation's second-largest federal building was dedicated in his honor.

"This glorious structure serves as a vivid reminder of him and his work," Nancy Reagan said, standing on stage in the cavernous, glass-topped atrium of the Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center.

The 3.1 million-square-foot fortress of limestone, concrete and glass was constructed on the site of a former parking lot on Pennsylvania Avenue near the White House. Among federal buildings, it is second in size only to the Pentagon. Built at a cost of $816 million, it will be the workplace of 7,000 public- and private-sector employees.

Ronald Reagan, 87, silenced by Alzheimer's disease, did not attend. While he prided himself as a budget cutter and foe of big government, the building represents a painful story of cost overruns.

Originally budgeted at $362 million, its costs soared over time.

The 125-foot atrium boasts an acre of glass. Standing near Nancy Reagan, President Clinton paid tribute to her husband. "If you look at this atrium, I think we feel the essence of his presence — his unflagging optimism, his proud patriotism, his unabashed faith in the American people."

In a strong, steady voice, Nancy Reagan said her husband never thought about having monuments or memorials dedicated to him.

Recalling Ronald Reagan's trip as president to Ireland, she said he was "sincerely flattered — a little surprised" that a pub was named after him in Ballyporeen. "But afterwards he said to me, 'You know, I know that presidents get things named after them, but I'll bet you I'm the first president who ever had a pub named after him.'"

Former Secretary of State George Shultz and retired Gen. Colin Powell led a list of Reagan administration leaders at the ceremony.

The Reagans' daughter, Maureen, also attended, as did Reagan image-maker Michael K. Deaver.

Clinton honored Ronald Reagan for his resolve to fight for freedom and his understanding that American leadership in the world remains indispensable.

"It is fitting that a piece of the Berlin Wall is in this building," Clinton said. "America's resolve and American ideals, so clearly articulated by Ronald Reagan, helped to bring that wall down."

Clinton challenged Congress to fulfill the spirit and honor the legacy of Ronald Reagan by appropriating money, now tied up in disputes with the administration, for the International Monetary Fund and the United Nations.

"President Reagan understood so clearly that America could not stand passively in the face of great change," Clinton said. "He understood we had to embrace the obligations of leadership to build a better future for all."

The tenants of the Ronald Reagan building include the Agency for International Development, the U.S. Customs Service, the Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Center for World Trade. The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars also will be located there.

The building is the second significant tribute to the 40th president in the Washington, D.C., area. This year, Congress added Ronald Reagan's name to Washington National Airport.

Secretary orders outside review

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Following claims by some congressional Republicans that the Clinton administration was meddling in the base-closing process, Defense Secretary William Cohen ordered an outside review of the competition for jobs at an Air Force base destined to be closed.

Tuesday, Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said Cohen acted "to eliminate some fears that this process won't be handled fairly."

Cohen accepted a request from acting Air Force Secretary F. Whitten Peters removing himself from deciding the outcome of jobs at McClellan Air Force Base in Sacramento, Calif. Peters set off the flap with an April 26 memo, made public by Republicans, in which he suggested Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre press Lockheed Martin Corp. to seek jobs that will be farmed out to private companies after McClellan is closed.

The Air Force is to determine who wins the jobs by the fall.

Bacon said Cohen decided an independent-review authority was needed to ensure fairness in the bidding process for jobs at McClellan.

The spokesman did not offer who that might be, but said it would be an individual or group of individuals familiar with the government's-contract selection process.

Responding to the Pentagon decision, House Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas, said, "I appreciate Secretary Cohen's swift reaction to our concerns. He clearly has a duty to protect the base-closing process from White House meddling."

Cohen's announcement came a day after Armey called for the resignations of Peters and John Podesta, the deputy White House chief of staff, over the Air Force memo. Armey had called the memo "irrefutable evidence that the Clinton administration has outrageously politicized the military base-closing process."

Republicans used the memo to assert that Clinton was playing favorites with vote-rich California, making it easy for workers at McClellan — due to be shut down in 2001 — to find work in the private sector. In particular, Rep. Jim Hansen, R-Utah, who released the memo, said he is concerned because contractors at an Air Force base in Utah scheduled for closing are rivals for McClellan's work.

At the White House, deputy press secretary Joe Lockhart dismissed Armey's complaint as Republican noise.

"White House officials did not ask the Department of Defense to encourage Lockheed to bid," he said.

"DoD volunteered to talk to Lockheed. John Podesta or others did not ask DoD to encourage Lockheed to perform the work in Sacramento. The issue of where the work would be done was not discussed."

"HE CLEARLY HAS A DUTY TO PROTECT THE BASE-CLOSING PROCESS FROM WHITE HOUSE MEDDLING."

Kansas plans to improve parks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — With $10 million in hand, Wildlife and Parks Secretary Steve Williams said he is making plans for a three-year program to change Kansas' 24 state parks from pitiful to pristine.

"Some of our facilities are embarrassing, and I think Kansans deserve a lot better," Williams said Monday. "This will help us update the park system to something that we all can be proud of."

Lawmakers, who wrapped up their 1998 session early Monday, included $10 million for parks improvements in the budget proposal recently signed by Gov. Bill Graves.

Graves recently said the parks improvement program "just got lost practically" in getting public notice. He called the plan the most significant investment in recent years for improving the parks.

Many of the parks — ranging in age from 20 to 40 years — still have original bathrooms, showerhouses, plumbing and electrical outlets for campers.

A combination of weathering, flooding and neglect left many parks needing repairs. And, because of federal mandates, many of the public facilities need handicap accessibility.

Williams said he hopes to award construction contracts in July, with work to start on parks in August. He said it will take three years to complete all the needed improvements.

Of the $10 million, $4.1 million will be used to replace showerhouses and restroom facilities $3.5 million to improve beaches and campgrounds $1.5 million for various buildings $650,000 to upgrade utilities and $140,000 for parking lots.

"Most of the work will be to improve what is already there," Williams said.

Plans call for some work to be done this year at each park from the largest — El Dorado — to the smallest — Mushroom Rock.

"Every park will see at least one project the first year, and the project will depend on need and condition," Williams said.

For instance, topping work orders at many parks will be replacing the outdated and sometimes dilapidated showerhouses. Mushroom Rock is to get restroom facilities to replace an old wooden privy.

"We are going to hit the projects most in need at first. If we can find a couple of parks close together needing restrooms, maybe we can bid them together and save some money," Williams said.

He said similar work will be done in the second and third years to repair campgrounds, including improved utilities and sewer lines and better drinking water hook-ups.

Williams said his largest concern is getting the improvements projects under way without creating inconvenience for the thousands who use the state parks.

"We can't tackle all of the problems in one year," Williams said.

The parks are financed mostly by those using them, with daily user fees ranging from $4 to drive into the park to $12 for a campsite with water, electrical and sewer hookups, plus other permit fees.

Cause of illnesses missing

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JUNCTION CITY — Employees of a catalog center stayed home again Tuesday as investigators tried to figure out what it was that made them sick twice over the weekend.

The Damark International offices remained closed as investigators from a private company searched for answers.

Carbon monoxide poisoning initially was thought to be what sent people to the hospital Friday, but detectors failed to turn up any hint of the gas.

The office then reopened, only to have workers get sick again Sunday.

Investigators from the Occupational Safety and Health Administration were at the plant Monday but could find no source for the illnesses.

A consulting firm is doing an environmental analysis of the building, said company spokesman Mike Collins. The firm will look at chairs, headsets and the compounds of which they are composed.

The water system at the office also has been tested and found to be satisfactory, Collins said.

Collins said he could not think of anything new brought into the building in recent weeks besides some chairs.

Some workers who went to the hospital Sunday said hospital officials told them a freon leak might be the cause, because the symptoms are similar to carbon monoxide poisoning. But that also has been ruled out, Collins said.

The building was evacuated after workers complained of nausea, dizziness and headaches. Those who became sick Sunday complained about being sent back to work before the company knew what had caused the earlier evacuation.

After 47 workers became sick on Friday, an investigation did not reveal the cause of the problem. The company reopened Saturday night, but the building was evacuated again Sunday during the new round of illnesses.

Collins said employees were being paid while they were off the job.

Company officials said workers who were taken to hospitals Sunday have been treated and released, and those affected Friday have all recovered.

U.S. sees drop in accidental deaths of children

▸ FATAL ACCIDENTS DROP 26 PERCENT, REMAINS NO. 1 KILLER OF YOUTHS.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Drew Bartlett knew just what to do when the smoke alarm sounded in the basement of his northeast Kansas home.

Glancing at the flames down the steps, he yelled for his 9-year-old sister and the family's babysitter to get out and rushed outside. He dialed 911 on a cordless phone once everyone left the Valley Falls, Kan., house, which burned to the ground.

He and 20 others joined children's advocates Tuesday in calling for greater awareness of the accidents that last year claimed 6,600 young lives — a rate that dropped 26 percent over the past decade, a report by the National SAFE KIDS Campaign found, but remains the No. 1 killer of children.

Bartlett's parents were at work in Topeka that afternoon last year, but they had taught him carefully and often had checked the smoke-alarm batteries. "They test it a lot of times when they cook — by accident — and they test it every time we switch the clocks," Bartlett said.

The report found progress in several areas, including a 40-percent drop in fire injuries and a 30-percent decline in deaths from drowning.

Helmets are credited with the dramatic 40-percent drop in deaths from bicycle injuries.

"There is no question that bike helmets are effective," said professional cyclist Greg LeMond, who insists that his own three young children wear helmets while riding. "Unfortunately, only 15 percent to 20 percent of America's children wear bike helmets."

He pointed to a New Jersey state study indicating bike-related deaths dropped by 60 percent five years after passage of a mandatory bicycle helmet law for children 13 and younger. He noted the first federal safety standard for bike helmets was issued in February.

Cullen Dwyer wasn't wearing a helmet when he skated into the street after a hockey puck near his Pembroke, Mass., home. He said he heard his friend warn, "Look out!" but didn't see the car coming. He suffered a traumatic brain injury that, despite remarkable recovery, slows and slurs his words.

"I was hurt so badly I had to be rushed to the hospital in a helicopter," said Dwyer, 14, during a hearing of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee. "Both my legs were broken, too. I was in a coma for a long time and doctors weren't sure if I would live or not."

Things that used to come so easily, like playing soccer or hockey, are much harder now. That's Dwyer's message to children who think helmets aren't cool. "I would like to show them a picture of me in the hospital and say, 'Do you want to end up like this?'" he said.

The coalition's study found motor-vehicle accidents that injure but don't kill rose slightly, as did injuries from such sports as basketball, baseball and in-line skating.

"Death rates from motor-vehicle crashes have shown little change," Heather Paul, the campaign's executive director, said. "We know why — nearly 40 percent of children still ride unrestrained, and four out of five car seats are improperly installed."

One of SAFE KIDS' prevention efforts is to conduct car-seat checkups at General Motors dealerships nationwide, she said.

Sen. Jim Jeffords, R-Vt., the panel's chairman, said the more than 240 SAFE KIDS coalitions have distributed more than 500,000 bicycle helmets, 340,000 child-safety seats and nearly 75,000 smoke alarms and batteries.

The campaign is pushing for better research and awareness; better safety devices, including child seats that are more compatible with automobiles; and stronger child-safety laws.

Cable company might not carry digital channels for CBS, NBC

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — Cable giant Tele-Communications is threatening not to carry CBS and NBC's new digital high-definition TV channels unless they switch to a format that takes up less channel space.

TCI Chairman John Malone, talking to reporters Tuesday at the industry's annual convention, said, "If they want to play spectrum hog, I think it is almost sucidical for them. I think it would be very foolish for them."

CBS and NBC said they will offer high-definition television, which provides viewers with supersharp pictures and sound, in a technical format dubbed 1080i that Malone said would eat up too much space on cable TV systems.

He said he is talking to ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox to work out voluntary agreements to carry their high-definition and other digital signals on cable systems. Some digital high-definition broadcasts are to begin this fall.

Malone said the networks other than CBS and NBC are using formats that won't take up too much space.

Unless those two change, Malone said he would not carry their stations on local cable systems voluntarily. Such a move would mean that cable TV customers who wanted to watch those networks' digital channels would flick an a/b switch, bypass the cable and get them from an antenna.

Malone said he would carry CBS and NBC's high-definition signals only if forced. "I'll do whatever the government orders me to do." he said. But he said carrying the two networks' technical format would force TCI to drop many cable channels.

Next month, the Federal Communications Commission will consider whether to force cable systems to carry broadcasters' digital channels.

Allegations of sexual harassment made against coach

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

Former members of the K-State Cheer Squad have made allegations of sexual harassment and abuse of power by Steve Kirkland, varsity cheer squad coach. Kirkland, however, has denied the allegations.

"Anne," who asked not to be identified, is a senior with one year on the junior varsity cheerleading squad and one year on varsity. She said she left the squad in the middle of this year.

"During the football season, I would go home crying a lot of nights," Anne said. "I didn't say anything last year when I was on the squad. I was afraid of how I would be treated."

Anne said Kirkland's lack of professionalism and inappropriate behavior added a lot of stress during practice and games.

"I'm nervous just talking about Steve. I don't think he's qualified. He's dated a girl on the squad and whenever they're having problems, he brings it into practice," Anne said. "Something has to be said or he's going to do it again."

Anne said that during the almost daily two-hour practices and social interaction, the members of the cheer squad became close.

"Everyone is real touchy, but we're all on the same level. We're all yell leaders and cheerleaders but he's the coach. He can't be on our level," Anne said. "I never really knew what sexual harassment was because it had never happened to me."

Anne said Kirkland's behavior at practices, squad parties and social functions away from campus made her uncomfortable.

"He'll give me a hug. He'll just grab the back of my neck and give me a massage. I wouldn't care if it was someone else, but I know how Steve is," Anne said. "He's very handsy. I felt like if I said anything, people would give me a hard time."

Anne said the harassment extended to late-night phone calls and asking her for dates.

"He asked me out a few weeks ago when we were in the bars. Automatically, I felt very uncomfortable," Anne said.

Anne said although she did not leave the squad specifically because of Kirkland's behavior, it was a big part of her unhappiness.

"I know there is stuff (athletics director) Max Urick doesn't see, and I don't know if he'd care. Whether or not (Kirkland) gets fired, I just want the behavior to change. It's like he always wants it to be about him. He's like, 'I'm the coach so what are you going to do for me,'" Anne said.

KIRKLAND

Anne said she enjoyed being on the cheer squad before Kirkland became a coach.

"Everybody I hung out with, every one of my friends — cheer squad became a huge part of my life. Cheer was the biggest thing in my life and then school," Anne said. "I love to cheer but because of the stuff Steve did, I didn't feel safe and it wasn't fair. Girls need to know what they're getting into. If he was just a friend it would be OK, but he's a coach."

Kirkland was on the K-State varsity cheer squad from 1993-95 and in October 1996, he became the head cheerleading coach and supervises an average of 30 students on the varsity squad. He is also director of a sports club and assistant events manager.

"Cheerleading-wise, I want to be able to guide them to make better choices," he said. "I also try to be there for them if they need me."

These choices include becoming good student athletes, good role models and responsible people, Kirkland said.

Kirkland, 26, said he has set definite boundaries between himself and the students on the squad. He said in addition to the two or three squad parties each year, he rarely socializes with cheerleaders and only when they invite him. However, he denied dating or being involved in inappropriate behavior with any member of the squad.

"I don't do any of that stuff. This is not true. This is just basically vindictive people that are upset about discipline problems they've had throughout the year or just unhappy because of the squad they may have been on, whether JV or varsity," Kirkland said.

The coach said criticism of him will reflect poorly on the image of the squad.

"They can talk bad about me all they want, but this is very unfair to the people on the squad. This is going to reflect badly on the squad as a whole, and I don't want that to happen," Kirkland said.

Scott Hopper, junior in psychology, cheered one year on varsity and one year on junior varsity before leaving the squad in November. Although Hopper left the squad after an argument with Kirkland before a game, he said his concern is for the future of the squad.

"Steve tries to take authority. Before he came it was a blast. After he came, it was a fight and struggle," Hopper said.

A COPY OF THE CODE OF CONDUCT POLICY FOR THE K-STATE CHEER SQUAD.

Coach requires cheerleaders to sign manual defining chain of command

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

Before the season began, all cheerleaders were required to sign a Code of Conduct manual that stated if any member chose to discuss problems within the squad to any authority above the coach, it would result in immediate suspension or dismissal.

In section four of the manual, the chain of command is stated explicitly. According to the manual, cheerleaders have two avenues for reporting a problem on the squad.

"Any question, problem or concern will first be presented to Steve Kirkland, the coach/adviser. The coach may then decide to present the concern to the athletic director," according to the manual.

There is no alternative stated in case the coach decides against presenting the concern to the athletics director, and no additional option is available if members of the cheer squad have a concern or direct problem with the coach.

"If you feel uncomfortable bringing the problem to the coach take it to your captains and they will bring the problem to the coach," the manual states.

According to the manual, the result for breaking the chain of command is specific: "Any breach of the chain of command will result in immediate suspension or dismissal. This rule applies to any member of the Athletic Department or Administration. Channel availability is not an excuse for breaching the chain of command. This is a very touchy subject so please do not break the ranks."

▶ What do we think?
The Collegian editorial board asks for defined communication routes for all athletes. See Page 4.

Scott Hopper, junior in psychology, cheered one year on varsity and one year on junior varsity before leaving the squad in November.

Hopper said that before the season begins, each squad member must sign the coach's Code of Conduct manual.

"This clause creates an environment based on fear of removal," Hopper said. "Because of this fear, no one has questioned the morality of the clause itself."

The fear of being removed from the team keeps squad members from bringing up concerns about the coach, Hopper said.

"Most people don't understand what goes on behind closed doors. Steve is the type of person

Human ecology moves graduation

▶ EXERCISES SHIFTED TO AHEARN DUE TO LARGER CLASS SIZE.

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

In response to this year's large graduating class, commencement ceremonies for the College of Human Ecology have been moved from McCain Auditorium to Ahearn Field House.

Commencement still will be at 9 a.m. May 16.

Because of the limited seating capacity of McCain, the college placed a limit of seven guest tickets per graduate. Others attending the ceremony would watch via closed-circuit television from another location on campus.

Barbara Stowe, Dean of the College of Human Ecology, said, "There will be plenty of space in Ahearn for all the graduates' guests, so we will be able to abandon using tickets."

"The last time we held commencement in Ahearn was in 1988. The facility has changed since then, and it will take a bit of coordination to prepare for the ceremony," Loleta Sump, facilities manager, said.

The drawback to using Ahearn for formal ceremonies is that there is no air-conditioning, and no fixed seating, Randy Slover, director of building maintenance, said. He said there are fans to circulate air in the facility.

"We are sorry they might not be quite as comfortable," Stowe said. "But it's more important that our graduates are able to invite their family and friends, even at the expense of a little comfort."

▶ Graduation info
The College of Human Ecology commencement is at 9 a.m. on May 16 at Ahearn Field House.

Cortney Keaton, graduating senior in human ecology, wrote a letter to the editor in the Collegian Tuesday voicing her concern for the limited number of seats originally available to guests in McCain.

About the location change, Keaton said, "It is very thoughtful of the faculty and the dean's office to move graduation for the students. I want to say thanks. This really shows they respect the graduating class."

"We regret any inconvenience," Stowe said. "We hope this is a workable solution."

Research project might lead to changes in USDA cooking recommendations for beef

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

An undergraduate senior research project at K-State might have prompted the U.S. Department of Agriculture to change its recommendations for cooking ground beef.

For a research project, Karen Killinger, senior in food sciences and industry, tested ground beef patties and found that the internal temperature of a cooked patty is more reliable than its color to determine whether or not the patty is safe to eat.

Killinger's study focused on ground beef purchased in grocery stores and cooked under conditions similar to the average consumer's kitchen. She specifically was interested in the incidence of "premature browning," a condition that occurs when a ground beef patty appears to be fully cooked because of its brown color, but has not reached an internal temperature sufficient to kill potential pathogens, such as E. coli and Salmonella.

"The temperature is 160 degrees Fahrenheit," Killinger said. "That's what a hamburger patty needs to be cooked to.

"Usually meat, when it's cooked, goes from red to pink to brown, and usually what we find is that hamburger patties can appear brown when they've only been cooked to 130 degrees," she said.

Killinger said internal temperature is an issue with ground beef because of the microorganisms that can be introduced during the grinding process.

"In general, if you go out and buy a steak at a grocery store, there will only be microorganisms on the outside of the steak, because the inside of the meat is naturally sterile," she said.

"When you make a ground beef patty, though, there can be microorganisms that can still be viable if the inside of the patty doesn't reach an internal temperature of 160 degrees."

Results of Killinger's studies and previous studies, she said, also revealed that ground beef with a pink color to it might be cooked sufficiently.

"You can have a hamburger patty that's at 160 degrees, and it can still be pink. But you can also have a patty that's at 130 degrees that looks brown, and that's why you have to check temperature, because color is not a reliable indicator," she said.

Melvin Hunt, professor of animal sciences and industry, said Killinger's research might have influenced the USDA's decision to change its former recommendation that ground beef be cooked until it is brown on the interior, to its present recommendation that it be cooked to 160 degrees.

"The USDA has not said that they changed their guidelines because of us, but I do know that in the Food Safety Inspection Service recommendations that they put out previous to June 1997, over half of the references they cited were from Kansas State University," Hunt said. "So we know that we've had an influence on public policy. And Karen's work, I think, helped precipitate some of that change."

The USDA has done a national survey of ground beef that is similar to what consumers would select from in a grocery store. Hunt said he thought the USDA was trying to verify whether Killinger's results were valid.

"From preliminary results of a USDA pilot study, their findings weren't too much different from Karen's — at least one out of three, one out of four, sometimes one out of two could give a misleading internal cooked color," Hunt said.

Killinger recommended using a meat thermometer when cooking hamburger patties at home. The temperature, she said, should be checked when the patty looks close to being done by inserting the thermometer half-way down into the center of the patty.

"I've found that, in the home, it can take a long time to get to 160 degrees," Killinger said.

Because the temperature of the patties likely will be checked more than once, precautions should be taken to prevent cross-contamination.

Randy Phebus, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, said the thermometer should be wiped off each time the temperature of the patty is checked.

"The best and most practical way in a kitchen is if you use warm soapy water

India Student Association to sponsor Bengali-musical performance on Sunday

The India Student Association will present a free performance, "Folk Dances and Songs of Bengal," at 3 p.m. Sunday in Forum Hall. Two people will sing folk songs, and another will dance.

Anjali Paul, Manhattan resident who will perform, said the program will last about an hour. The songs will be in the Bengali language. They will explain what each song means before it is performed.

Paul said she also will play the harmonium, an Indian keyboard instrument.

Lelah Dushkin, assistant professor of sociology and director of the South Asia Center, said she thought the folk music is easier to get used to than some of the classical Indian music. She said sometimes Westerners find classical music too exotic.

"My reaction to the folk songs from Bengal is that they don't have that problem," she said. "They have good tunes and anybody can connect with them."

Paul said that right after harvest, farmers sing folk songs with the whole family. She said when the food is ready in the field, they sing a folk song. They sing for the sun and the rain and pray to God for the weather.

She said folk songs are part of the village and have been around for hundreds of years. They still are sung today.

Dushkin said she thought the performance would be a good chance for students to relax for an hour.

"Especially when you are preparing for exams, you might as well do something that gives you a little bit of a break," she said.

Indira Reddy, India Student Association president and graduate student in grain science and industry, said they are wrapping up the year with one final show.

"We would like the people to get together," she said. "We want everyone who is interested in India and wants to learn about India to come to the show."

Reddy said it is a chance for students to take a break from studying.

"For one hour they can go visit a foreign culture and then come back to their books," she said.

Committee selects 4 finalists for position of dean at veterinary medicine college

The College of Veterinary Medicine is in the final steps of hiring a new dean. Two of the final four candidates were interviewed in the past week. The remaining two finalists are scheduled to interview next week.

The final four candidates chosen by the 16-member Dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine Search Committee were announced March 23.

Search Committee Chair, Dr. Michael Dryden, said the search had gone well.

"It has been a good process," he said. "The committee worked extremely well together and recognized this was an extremely vital hire."

Dr. Ralph Richardson, department head of veterinary clinical sciences at Purdue University, was the first of the four candidates to be interviewed last week. Richardson was also the only graduate of K-State, bachelor of science in 1969 and doctorate of veterinary medicine in 1970, to apply for the position.

Dr. Francis Kallfelz, director of the veterinary medical teaching hospital at Cornell University, was the second candidate interviewed last week. Kallfelz received his doctorate of veterinary medicine and doctorate at Cornell.

Dr. Prem Paul, the associate dean for research and graduate studies, and assistant director of the agricultural & home economics experiment station at Iowa State University, will interview from Sunday to Tuesday next week. Paul received his bachelor of veterinary science from Panjab Agricultural University in India and his doctorate from the University of Minnesota.

Dr. David Thawley, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine at Minnesota University, will be the last candidate interviewed. Thawley, who received his bachelor of veterinary science at Massey University in New Zealand and his doctorate at the University of Guelph in Canada, will interview from Tuesday until Thursday next week.

During the interview process, all of the candidates will meet with Myron Beard, a representative of RHR International Management Psychologists who was hired by the university, and has helped the search committee throughout the entire search.

"The reason a lot of higher management fails is usually because they can't handle all the different personalities they work with, Myron Beard is helping us to find the best fit for our school," Dryden said.

Students forewarned school authorities about Arkansas shooting, lawyer says

NEW YORK — Other students warned school authorities before the deadly Arkansas schoolyard shooting, a former lawyer of one of the boys accused said Wednesday.

Tom Furth, who was removed as 13-year-old Mitchell Johnson's lawyer for making statements to the media, told Court TV's "Cochran & Co." that a guidance counseler and perhaps another teacher were warned.

He did not provide the names or any details of the warning.

"There will be adult accountablity, and there were other people who knew about this and they were warned ahead of time," said Furth, who now represents Mitchell's father.

Westside Middle School Principal Karen Cutner said after the shootings that no one on the staff or faculty were aware of any threats.

Mitchell and Andrew Golden, 11, are accused in the March 24 shootings in Jonesboro, Ark., that left four children and a teacher dead. They are charged as juveniles with capital murder and battery.

"An 11-year-old and 13-year-old don't plan something like this without talking about it or without other people being involved," Furth said. "It's our understanding that there were a couple other children who knew about this."

Furth did not say whether Mitchell was the one who talked about other people being involved.

Torrential rains cause mudslides in Italy; at least 25 die, 1,800 people left homeless

SARNO, Italy — Torrents of mud and debris roared through the narrow streets of southern Italy on Wednesday, killing at least 25 people and engulfing hundreds of homes. More than 70 other people were feared buried alive.

After two days of incessant rain, the fast-flowing streams burst with a ferocious intensity into towns in the heavily populated area south of Naples. The mud avalanches tore apart houses and bridges and swallowed cars in a matter of minutes.

Italy declared a state of emergency, promising $29 million in immediate aid and calling out the army to help cope with the disaster as thousands of residents fled to higher ground.

At least 1,800 people were left homeless in a 40-mile swath from Naples to Salerno, chief civil protection officer Andrea Todisco said.

Scores of firefighters and emergency workers used cranes and bulldozers to navigate hip-deep muck Wednesday, rescuing at least 160 people and searching for the missing.

Many residents spent Tuesday night on rooftops or on the highest floors of apartment buildings to avoid the deadly flows. Some waved white handkerchiefs from windows Wednesday to attract rescue workers, who lowered themselves from helicopters to reach the stranded residents.

Hardest hit was Sarno, a town of 2,000 people 75 miles east of Naples, where at least 13 people died. Mud flowing down a mountain burst through Sarno's Villa Malta hospital, sweeping away part of a staircase and pouring through its windows and doors.

Jazz bands to play at Union Station

MIKE BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

Jazz bands will battle it out Friday night during the third-annual "Big Band Bash" at Union Station.

Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies and "Big Band Bash" coordinator, said the event will be a battle of the big bands.

More info?
"Big Band Bash" will be from 8 to 11 p.m. Friday in Union Station. Admission is free.

"They don't fight each other, but everyone wants to be the best band," he said.

He said this concert always takes place on the last day of classes. Admission is free, and Sbarro will be serving pizza late for those who attend the concert.

He said the concert will be relaxed compared with other concerts.

"It will be very different than the formal atmosphere that they are used to," he said. "We have a very strict dress. They can wear shorts, but they have to be wearing the jazz festival T-shirts. A major part of it is the fun element."

The concert will feature the Concert Jazz Ensemble, Lab A Band, Lab B Band, Monday Jazz Combo, Flute Juice and Jazz Repertoire Combo, and will last from 8 to 11 p.m.

Jena Pralle, bassist in Concert Jazz Ensemble and senior in music education,. said the concert will feature a variety of music. She said they will be playing funk, Latin music, swing and some ballads.

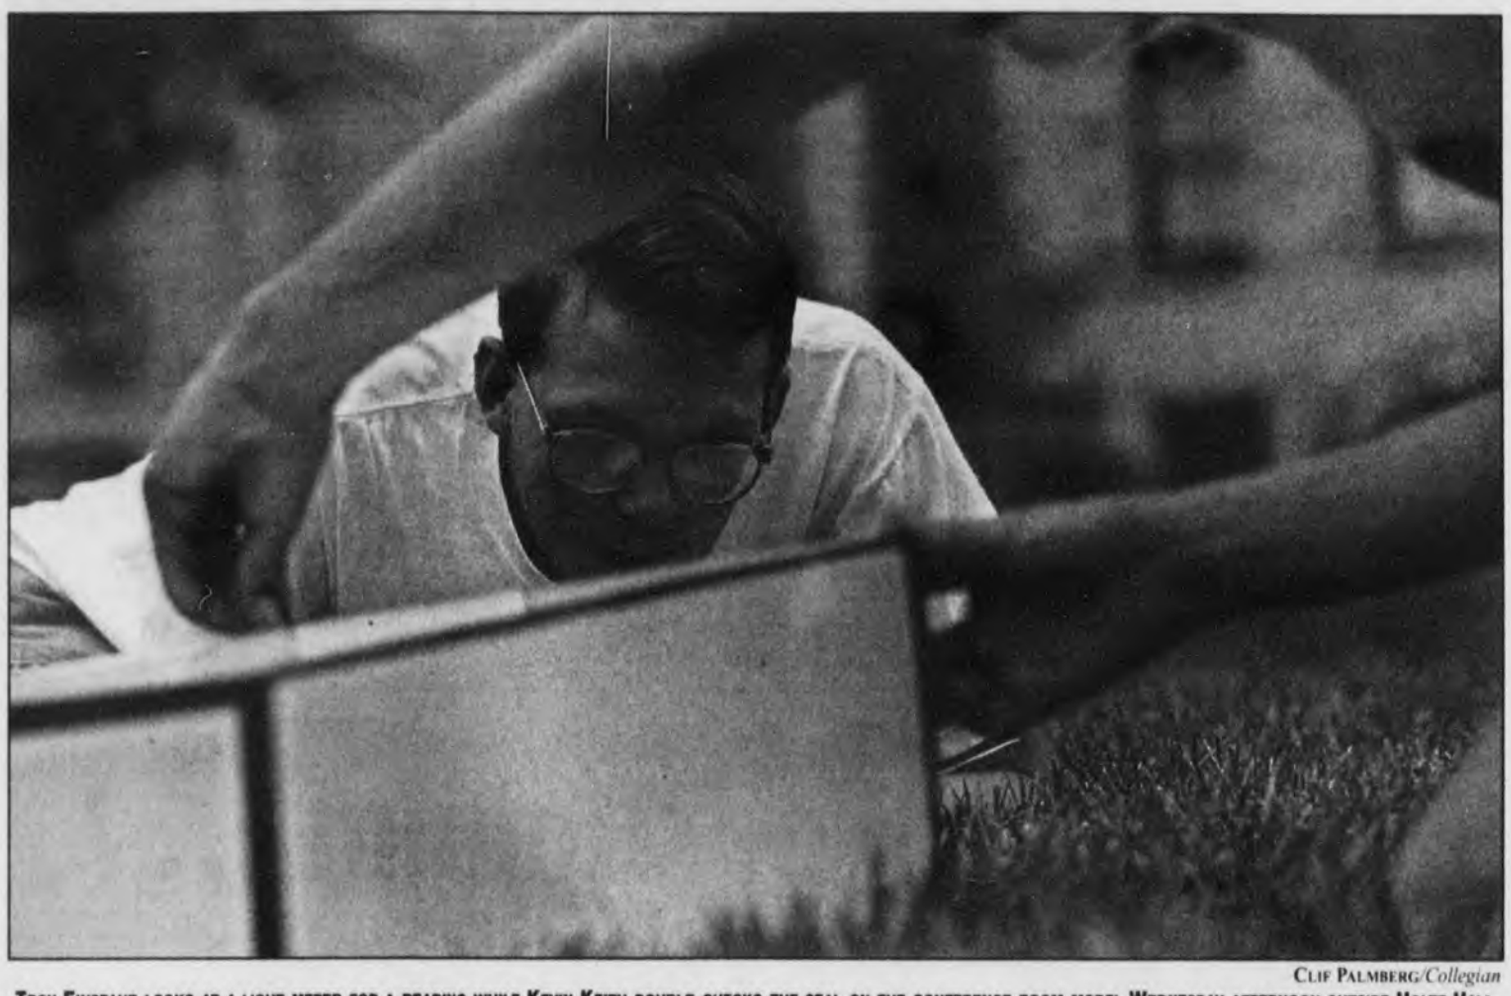
"We have covered the broad spectrum of everything," she said, "some old standards and some new things that maybe not everyone has heard."

She said this is her last jazz concert at K-State.

"It is kind of neat to be doing it in an informal setting," she said.

In addition to being the graduating seniors' last concert, it will be a last for Wilson, who conducts three big bands and nine ensembles.

"This is my last time directing the jazz big band," he said.



Luke Chaffee, senior in music education and lead trumpet in the Concert Jazz Ensemble, said it should be a lot of fun.

"It is about the only concert that all of the big bands play at all year," he said.

Wilson said all the bands will get on the stage together for the finale, and all the bands will join and play one song together.

"It will definitely be the place to be," he said.

Board of Regents to vote on 7.6-percent faculty salary increase

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

An early draft of the K-State budget for the 1999-2000 school year indicates a tuition raise of 2.4 percent to meet inflation.

The budget proposal is now before the Kansas Board of Regents, who will take staff recommendations on its final form at a May 21 meeting. The budget could be voted on at the May meeting, though it is likely final approval will come in June.

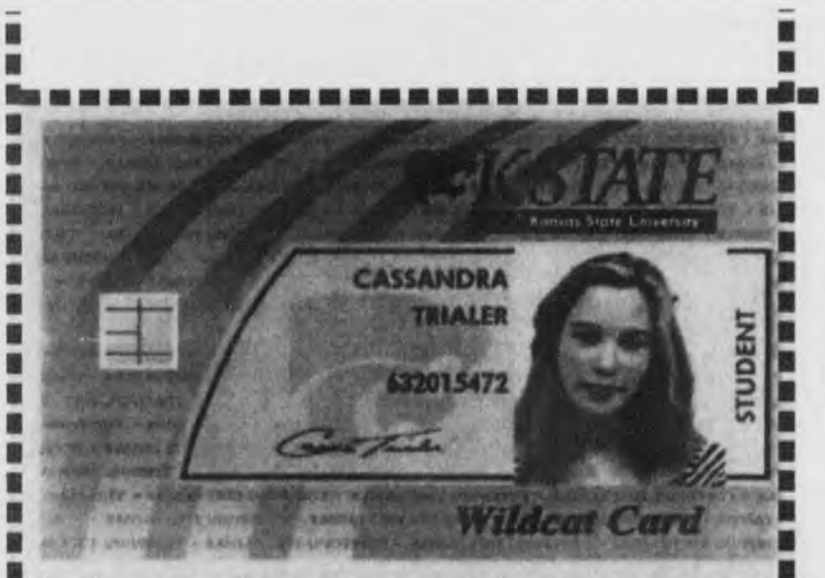
Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said the proposals for the fiscal year 1999 budget were made by the regents budget committee. The board must adopt those before each institution can prepare their budgets for submittal to Gov. Bill Graves.

Also included in the proposed budget is a 3.6-percent faculty salary increase for inflation, coupled with a 4-percent increase to improve peer standing, for a total of 7.6 percent. Presently, K-State faculty are paid at 88 percent of their peers' salary level.

The regents have proposed a three-year plan of 4-percent increases, for an eventual total of 12 percent, to offset the current 12-percent gap.

K-State Budget Director John Struve said there might be some questions about the faculty salary increase later on in the budget process.

"That's a fairly large increase," Struve said. "But this is a fairly neutral request process this year. Sometimes it can get pretty competitive between the universities."



To address library funding shortfalls, the regents proposed a 1-percent Other Operating Expenses increase on top of a 2.4-percent increase for inflation. The regents requested the same 1-percent increase just a few months ago, but Graves only recommended a one-half-percent increase, which was passed by the Kansas Legislature.

There also is room in the budget proposal for a 1-percent general base budget increase to fund program enhancements, but Rawson said he's not sure that will stay in the budget after the June meeting.

Another measure that could prove controversial is K-State's request for a $500,000, one-time expenditure for a campus master planning consultant.

After the regents approve the budget, it goes to the governor who makes his recommendations in December. The Legislature begins working on its own budget in January and usually concludes in late April or early May.

Cheer squad needs to revise code of conduct

There are always problems when authority figures have too much power.

The code of conduct for the K-State Cheer Squad puts the coach in such a situation.

The code provides for suspension or dismissal of any cheerleader who chooses to discuss problems within the squad to any authority above the coach.

Such stipulations put the coach in a position of ultimate power over the squad members, who have nowhere to turn if they are dissatisfied with other cheerleaders or the coach.

But power corrupts.

With no system of checks or balances on the squad, members are constantly in fear of being removed from the team. Cheerleaders who put their heart and soul into the squad have to put up with any abuse of power or else they could lose what they've worked so hard for.

There is a tendency for many people to blame the victims in situations like this. Some would argue that cheerleaders should quit the squad if they are upset with the system or the chain of command. But these people are put on the squad to cheer, not to put up with abuses of power.

The students who came out against the code of conduct should be praised for taking the first step in having the system changed. They are paving the way for future members of the team to have an enjoyable experience as cheerleaders that they can be proud of.

There is obviously a need for outside involvement in this matter. The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics needs to have an independent third party come in and take a look at the chain of command as well as the alleged abuses of power.

The university itself should take a stand and protect its students from situations where they feel uncomfortable.

Otherwise, this will be a black eye for K-State and any future cheerleading squads.

Making ya go, 'Hmmm ...'

Pesky questions about K-State community linger.

Where to begin, and where to end? Every one of us comes to K-State for our own reasons and leaves with unique memories.

We must share something while we're here, though, or we'd all leave and that would be that. There'd be no KSU Alumni Association, no Telefund and no bowl-game caravans.

Our primary reason for being here, however, is to get an education, and that's why I'm concerned. Despite the overall positive regard I have for K-State, I still have a slew of unanswered questions related to how things operate on this campus and to my future status as an alumnus.

VIEWPOINT

PAUL ROBBEN

Paul is a senior in chemistry. You can send e-mail to Paul at vladr@ksu.edu.

Hopefully, other students share some of my concerns, and maybe we'll get some answers in our last days here so we can leave campus without any regrets.

Why does homecoming keep happening?

One rarely hears anyone say anything good about it, and even though it's supposedly not a greek function, one will see more independents at a greek all-U party than at homecoming.

Where does one buy a Cornhusker diaper pail?

I want to make sure that any children I ever might have will grow up understanding the proper order of the universe.

Why is there a campout for basketball tickets?

If we are interested in teaching applicable knowledge, why not substitute an activity that will teach the truth about how the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics operates? We could have the best seats go to whichever group of students collects the most ransom money by kidnapping alumni.

Bonus points could be awarded to the students who kidnap the most alumni, collect the biggest ransom for a single alumnus, or even to whomever kidnaps the most recent alumnus.

Would the real Willie the Wildcat stand up?

Wouldn't it be great if K-State had its own vigilante superhero? Instead of Batman or the Green Lantern, our Willie would fight evil athletic directors, incarcerate embezzlers and punish Student Governing Association members who engage in self-promotion.

How long before the coaching staff of the women's crew team has to suspend a team member for being arrested on charges of drug possession?

Or the coaching staff of the track, volleyball, tennis or golf teams, for that matter. It makes one wonder what the problem is. Can these coaches just not recruit the big-time stars?

Why doesn't President Jon Wefald hold an Easter Egg hunt on his front lawn?

Why would a student send a letter to the editor, claiming that a columnist is the dumbest the Collegian ever has employed, and then send another letter later in the semester, arguing more points, revealing that he or she continued to read the writer's column?

From the e-mail I've received this semester, the art of public discourse seems to be in need of defibrillation here at K-State.

Should you ever feel like responding to a column and really want to be taken seriously, keep a few things in mind:

1) Always begin with the assumption that the columnist is both ignorant and dim-witted.

2) Because the columnist is ignorant, it's all right, go ahead and just skim the column — you wouldn't want to be accused of actually grasping the main point of the column, anyway.

3) Insults are good.

4) Personal attacks are better.

5) Never, under any circumstance, run a spell check. Leaving it "just as it is" will give your response that extra-special shine.

Do you remember what you were doing when you heard that God had been shot?

This was the same day that Sam Sackett was appointed as a replacement.

If KSDB-FM 91.9 can afford to air "Reggae Extravaganza" and "Into Africa," why can't it afford to air Indian or Chinese music programs?

Last I knew, there were more Chinese and Indian students than African students on campus. Shouldn't all three groups, as well as other K-Staters, have the chance to enjoy their cultures?

Who cares about student apathy?

If the future alumni center ends up looking similar to the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, would Gov. Bill Graves declare K-State eligible for disaster aid to help clean up the mess?

Where's the love?

Who would be surprised if, during a nuclear exchange, the Power Plant's chimney opened up to reveal a working ICBM?

How does one find a dentist willing to wear a Jayhawk costume while cleaning teeth?

Back to the kids I might never have — one can never be too careful when raising kids.

If this doesn't do it, maybe I could find a pediatrician willing to wear a Roy Williams mask while giving shots.

And last, but definitely not least:

Don't you have something more interesting to read?

MARNY BURKE/Collegian

Hazing does not build brotherhood or unity

By now, most people on campus have become aware of the details surrounding the beating of Ernest L. Harris Jr.

We have heard of how he went to visit his girlfriend after a fraternity initiation rite, bruised and barely able to walk. We have heard of how he managed to make it to sleep, but when he woke he began vomiting and urinating blood.

We have heard the statements of Harris' family, that he believes the fraternity is an excellent organization, that things just got out of hand.

While investigators still might be making up their minds about whether the alleged hazing incident was an actual "hazing" incident or just severe battery (they wouldn't want to make a mistake about how to process their charges), it seems many other groups have made up their minds — the population of the United States, for instance. My grandmother called me up the other day from Detroit, wondering whether being in a fraternity at K-State meant I enjoyed participating in random beatings.

VIEWPOINT

JON KURCHE

Jon is a sophomore in physics. You can send e-mail to Jon at jsk6609@ksu.edu

"You're not beating those pledges, are you?" she asked.

"No, Grandma, hazing is a primitive, illogical practice, only supported by desperate men with poor self-esteem who need to feel strong by willfully inflicting pain on another human being. They are sadists who enjoy having justification to walk on the lunatic fringe. They are poor excuses for men," I said.

"Exactly. You're sure you're not beating those pledges? Because I heard on the news about some K-State hazing incident," she said.

"Grandma, all of the pledges in my house could pound me into smithereens," I said. "Besides, I'm not a sadist."

"Then why don't you ever call?" she said.

What justifies hazing? What rationale do hazing participants have that makes hazing so difficult to eradicate? Why is it still so widespread? Many independents recognize the dangers of hazing, and often it is cause for them to remain independent. Why is it so difficult for members of fraternities to see the same dangers?

The most common defenses for hazing generally fall into two categories: Hazing is necessary to build brotherhood, and hazing is necessary because of tradition.

I challenge anybody to find a fraternity whose rush slogan reads, "Join our fraternity, where hazing is a tradition."

It sounds more like an addiction.

The argument that hazing builds brotherhood is logically inconsistent. Pledge-class unity is built by shared experiences, not by shared pain. Pledge experiences are an introduction to organized living. There is a certain amount of anxiety already built in, simply by measuring up to the challenges and leadership roles the fraternity requires. Pledges look up to actives from the beginning for guidance and advice. For an active in an organization to haze a pledge at such a delicate time is akin to child abuse. It is that abhorrent.

We need to develop a means to end the cycle of abuse. This event is the first time since football season that K-State has made headlines in The Kansas City Star. Fitting that it should be something embarrassing; however, I quickly should point out that the Star did not include the words "minority fraternity" in any of the articles it published on the recent alleged hazing incident. That observation indicates that while we might see a difference between specialized minority social fraternities and the living arrangements with which most people identify, nobody else sees a difference between, for example, Kappa Alpha Psi and Alpha Tau Omega.

When it comes to social fraternities, it's all greek to them. It is for this reason that I propose that all social fraternities become part of the Interfraternity Council. I personally think that should have been done a long time ago.

IFC provides definitive rules and definitive punishments for breaking those rules. It is a logical control to prevent incidents similar to the one that occurred, by providing guidelines for fraternal behavior. It serves as a positive role model for other social organizations. It allows all social organizations to meet in a forum to address issues that affect the whole campus, and it provides a variety of leadership incentives.

Most important is the fact that combining minority fraternities with other live-in fraternities, while uncomfortable at first, would do wonders for campus diversity. Many rightly claim IFC is not sensitive to diversity issues. A move to consolidate fraternity organizations would provide better cross-racial interaction through homecoming activities, meetings, social-service projects and the all-greek chapter.

It also would provide diversity through rush. If all people, regardless of racial status, received the same book with the same multicultural fraternities, if they all went through rush at similar times, if they all were given the opportunity to be recruited by a variety of different organizations, we could become the diverse campus we should be.

There's plenty to gain. Ask Harris how much there is to lose.

Carney says letter not founded in truth

Editor,

After reading Monday's letter to the editor by David Levin, graduate student in entomology, one of my favorite lines from the movie "Four Rooms" came to mind. In that movie, Quentin Tarentino's character says, "The less one makes declarative statements, the less likely one is to look foolish in retrospect." Upon reading Levin's letter, this is a statement that I believe he should ponder deeply.

I make this statement because many of the comments expressed by Levin related to myself, the Wildcat Card, Union Governing Board and Student Governing Association originate both from an overextended sense of self-importance and a complete lack of understanding of the issues.

In his letter, Levin pulled one quote that was encapsulated and set-off from an April 28 article as his main issue. If he actually would have read the entire article — after reading his entire letter, it is clear he did not read the entire article — he would have discovered that I wanted all the departments on the K-State campus that utilized the Wildcat Card and its services to shoulder the burden of this deficit equally.

Next year it is projected that the K-State Student Union will have to account for a $72,000 deficit while the university as a whole puts in only $50,000. There are many departments that use the services of the Wildcat Card, and I believe they should pay more of an equal part of the bill.

Furthermore, I never stated the students should shoulder this burden. One word of debate advice to you, Levin: When you attempt to pull a quote, never alter the context in which the quote was provided, because someone will call you on it and make you look foolish.

The second point I will take to task is Levin's assertion that SGA lost $100,000. While we are all in the academic world and somewhat sheltered from the realities of the real world, one thing is clear: When it comes to running any type of organization or business, people are entrusted with the operation of the organization, and a certain amount of trust has to be given to the staff so it might address problems and obstacles as they arise.

Neither SGA nor anyone else on this campus simply lost $100,000. In fact, those funds allegedly were stolen by a person entrusted with both power and responsibility.

Unfortunately, this person allegedly abused his or her power and position to take what was clearly not his or hers. The only thing worse than this abuse of trust is your juvenile assertion that SGA lost the money.

I have never had an opportunity to meet you, sir, and from your ill-thought-out and mudslinging letter to the editor, I hope I never have to endure the experience. What is clear is that you have a talent for slanting, clouding and muddying many issues in order to make personal attacks against others on this campus.

Sir, as a graduating senior, I honestly can say I could care less about your opinion, but when you pen letters that distort the truth and attack students and organizations alike, I believe a response is warranted. If you get nothing else from my response, I hope you keep in mind the old saying: When you have nothing good or productive to say, it is far wiser to just keep your mouth shut.

All parties in hazing should be punished

Editor,

After reading about the University of Maryland-Eastern Shore proposal to punish the "victims" of hazing incidents who do not report abuse, I have to say, "It's about time!"

The Maryland proposal doesn't go far enough. It only punishes the willingly abused for not reporting the abuse, not for willingly participating in the hazing in the first place.

If hazing really is an activity we want to eradicate, then it's time we started punishing all of the willing participants in the hazing. That includes the pledges who are willing to be hazed.

At its heart, a hazing incident is a sadomasochistic episode. The fraternity members performing the hazings are playing the role of sadist, while the pledges at the receiving end are playing the role of masochist. Both are in the relationship consensually. Both are guilty of breaking the rules against hazing.

I really was surprised to read Pat Bosco's comments that describe punishing the hazee as "punishing the victim twice." These aren't rape victims we are talking about here.

These aren't domestic violence situations, muggings or random assaults performed on an unwilling victim, either. These are all willing participants we are talking about.

Even more incredible was the comment by a fraternity president who said the proposal would be punishing an innocent party. Innocent? Sorry, I don't buy it. The hazee knew the rules against hazing before allowing himself to be hazed, and he willingly broke those rules.

The whole "Let's don't blame the victim" mentality is totally inappropriate here.

As in any sadomasochistic relationship, all participants in hazings are entering into an abusive power-imbalance relationship willingly, and all parties should be blamed for it, if we are going to blame anybody at all.

If we truly want to send the message that hazing is a behavior that is not to be tolerated, then all parties willingly entering into the hazing need to be punished, not just the abusers.

I feel no sympathy for people like Kappa Alpha Psi member Ernest L. Harris Jr., who ended up in the hospital last month after an apparent hazing incident.

Harris was not a victim of hazing, but a perpetrator.

Housing district to feature variety of estates, designs

▸ COLBERT HILLS TO PLAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT THAT WILL BEGIN IN APRIL.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Driving west on Kimball Avenue, you slow down as you pass through an entryway heavily planted with trees and shrubs.

On both sides of the tree-lined parkway that you're cruising, families walk their dogs, neighbors jog. Your car dips in and out of rolling hills until you arrive at your new home, leave your car and step out onto a back deck that overlooks the lush Colbert Hills Golf Course.

That's the lifestyle planners envision for the new 2,000-resident Grand Mere housing and commercial development proposed for northwest Manhattan, just north of Kimball and west of Seth Childs Road.

Salina, Kan., resident Jack Vanier, who owns and is developing the land surrounding Colbert Hills, said, "I want it to be one of the best neighborhoods."

Grand Mere, French for "grandmother," is the first residential development with which Vanier, president of the ranching company Western Star, has been involved. He attended K-State as an animal husbandry major until joining the military in 1951. He is also the father-in-law to Vice President of Institutional Advancement Bob Krause, who is spearheading the Colbert Hills project.

Though plans have not been finalized, Vanier's planners have determined for the most part just how the development will take shape. What they've planned, which could be presented to the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board this month, is something different for Manhattan.

Phase one, just a year away

Doug De Monbrun, project manager for Grand Mere and Vanier employee, said the developer plans to have phase one underway by April of next year.

This would include plotting lots and offering them for sale to potential homeowners. By that stage, however, various building contractors would be brought in to build homes, and a new house could be bought as early as spring 2000.

The total development of the nearly 650 acres will be phased over nearly 30 years. Commercial development, such as a small village pocket with perhaps a lodge, will come later in development and may not be undertaken by Vanier.

Susan Wade is the project manager on Grand Mere and a senior planner for Downing Thorpe & James, a full-service planning, landscape architecture and civil engineering firm in Boulder, Colo.

Wade said Grand Mere will feature an overall development plan — a document that will set design guidelines to ensure the whole community will maintain distinct design standards. That could include, among other things, paint colors, finishes, setbacks and building materials.

The residential development could include townhomes, apartments, single-family homes, golf-course homes and luxury estates.

It will be laced with a parkway and trail system that will connect with existing city trails and with roughly 165 acres of land that will be set aside from the golf course as open space.

All of the development will take place along the sides of the hills, giving homes a view of the course that will meander through the lowland pockets of the neighborhood.

> "MORE DEVELPOPERS ARE BEING SITE SENSITIVE TO THE NATURAL TERRAIN RATHER THAN BULLDOZING AND MASS RAZING. THE GOLF COURSE NEEDS TO BE VERY NATURAL. THE LAND PLANNING AND THE GOLF COURSE DESIGN HAVE MERGED NICELY."

> project manager and senior planner for Downing Thorpe & James

"More developers are being site sensitive to the natural terrain rather than bulldozing and mass razing," Wade said. "The golf course needs to be very natural. The land planning and the golf course design have merged nicely."

De Monbrun said a townhome in the development could be priced at $100,000, and single-family homes could hit the $500,000 mark. He said some custom luxury estates could go for $1,000,000 or more.

"We're trying to introduce some new markets the city doesn't have, like vacation homes, say for football season, or retirement homes," De Monbrun said.

Course-side homes

Vanier's roughly 960 acres include the 315-acre Colbert Hills golf course. The deal to sell that land to the K-State Golf Course Management and Research Foundation, the developer of the course, was closed Tuesday.

There has been some criticism of Krause's role in the golf course and the potential benefits to his in-laws.

Responding to his critics, Vanier said, "I don't listen to them."

Krause has said in the past he was not involved with choosing the property for the golf course. That was done by Jim Colbert, the PGA Senior Tour player for whom the project is named.

According to the Riley County appraiser's office, Vanier's 960 acres are classified as AR, for agriculture rural, and are appraised at $64,850.

The property is taxed at 30 percent of its appraised value, or $19,455 per year. The appraised value represents the land-use price, not the market price.

Vanier said he plans to continue using the property for ranching until construction begins.

If the development is reclassified, which is likely after the land is annexed by the city and then rezoned, it would fall into lower tax rates. Property can be rezoned without being reclassified.

For example, a property could be zoned residential, but classified as agriculture. Therefore, it would be taxed as agriculture unless it was plotted and reclassified for building to begin.

Danny Williams, a commercial specialist with the county appraiser's office, said as he understands it now, the golf course will be zoned as commercial property, though he said not much information has been supplied to his office.

He said as long as the land for Grand Mere is used for agriculture, it is taxed at a lower value because its market value is kept low.

If it were to be reclassified as residential, Williams said the market value would soar because of the land's proximity to the golf course.

But if housing lots are plotted and construction begins on some of the lots, Williams said the market value of the lots then becomes the basis of appraisal. He said lots in a comparable subdivision, like Sharingbrook or Wyndham Heights, are going for between $25,000 and $35,000.

It's likely that single-family lots would go for those prices in Grand Mere as well, Williams said.

Colbert Hills project moves forward

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

The $13.5 million, 315-acre Colbert Hills Golf Course is on track to begin construction in June.

Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement and the university official driving the project, said close to $7 million has been committed, and an additional $3.4 million in requests are in progress to go toward basic course construction costs of $10.1 million.

The course development is on land north of Kimball Avenue and west of Seth Childs Road, adjacent to the Farm Bureau building.

The $13.5 million total includes financing costs for the 25-year bonds, a clubhouse and maintenance facilities, though Krause said he thinks the bonds will be paid off early.

Presently, the K-State Golf Course Management and Research Foundation, a non-profit corporation, is seeking annexation of the property it plans to purchase from current owner Jack Vanier. That is expected to occur this month. Vanier, who is Krause's father-in-law, is developing the remaining 650 acres of his property into the Grand Mere residential and commercial area.

The majority of the charitable donations for the course — named in honor of PGA Senior Tour player and 1964 K-State alumnus Jim Colbert — come in the form of $100,000 contributions. This level of donation entitles the donor to a lifetime membership and percentage green-fee exemption, which is based on a complex equation accounting for projected lifespan of the donor and the proximity to which they live near the course.

Krause said the intent of the golf foundation is to market the course to alumni.

"I'm assuming the developer would look at the market and see if there's a market to entice alumni to come back here," Krause said.

He said getting alumni back to Manhattan would increase K-State's opportunities for getting them involved in the university either in a financial or service aspect.

Many local environmentalists have criticized the development, but the golf foundation has countered the criticism with a dedication to making the course as environmentally responsible as possible.

A recent $40,000 study was undertaken by Sustainable Development Resources Group, which will track development of the course to test whether it eventually could be classified as a signature course.

This qualification deems a course environmentally responsible and takes into account land conservation and use. Colbert Hills will leave 150 of its 315 acres as open space.

"It takes several years to achieve signature status," Krause said. "It seemed to us to be the most appropriate."

Rockets guard car-jacked early Wenesday morning

HOUSTON — Houston Rockets guard Mario Elie was pistol-whipped, and his Mercedes-Benz stolen early Wednesday when he stopped at a Houston intersection.

Elie's convertible was recovered on the opposite side of town hours after the 2:20 a.m. incident. Police said the car's radio had been ripped out.

Elie told police two men approached his 1993 convertible, one on each side of the car, when he stopped at an intersection on the city's southwest side.

When Elie turned his head to look at the man on the passenger side, he was struck on top of his head by the other assailant with a pistol and told to get out of the car. He didn't require hospitalization for his injuries.

Elie hailed a cab and reported the incident to police at a nearby service station.

"Mr. Elie is fortunate in this case," police spokesman John Cannon said. "He complied with what these guys wanted."

Jordan, Pippen lead selections to NBA's All-Defensive team

CHICAGO — Let Allen Iverson perfect his crossover dribble. Shaquille O'Neal can rattle all the rims he wants with his monster dunks. Michael Jordan will match those pretty moves and any others.

Then he will go down to the other end of the floor and snatch the ball right out of your hands.

Jordan, who won a record 10th NBA scoring title this season, was selected to a record ninth All-Defensive team Wednesday. Joining him was Chicago Bulls teammate Scottie Pippen, who made his seventh team.

"We pride ourselves on playing solid defense," Jordan said. "Offensively we can go on and off, maybe make some jumpers or maybe not. But defense, we know, wins championships."

Just look at Chicago's five NBA titles this decade. Though the Bulls have Jordan, who averaged 28.7 points per game to edge O'Neal for the scoring title, defense has been the cornerstone of their title runs.

And as the Bulls get older and the titles pile up, defense becomes even more important. On Sunday, even though everyone but Jordan and Pippen struggled offensively, Chicago still beat Charlotte 83-70 by keeping the Nets to 10 points in the third quarter and 36 percent shooting overall.

"Right now, that's what we have to rely on," Pippen said.

"Defensively, that's what this team's bread and butter is. That's how we have to create some offense."

Joining Jordan and Pippen on the first team are Karl Malone of the Utah Jazz at forward; guard Gary Payton of the Seattle SuperSonics and center Dikembe Mutombo of the Atlanta Hawks.

Payton made the defensive team for the fifth time. Mutombo, chosen the NBA's defensive player of the year Tuesday, and Malone are on the team for the second time.

USC in violation of Title IX; federal funding may be cut

LOS ANGELES — The University of Southern California is in violation of Title IX, the federal law guaranteeing female athletes equal rights on the playing field, the Orange County Register reported Wednesday.

However, a school spokesperson refuted the report, saying it lacks balance and perspective.

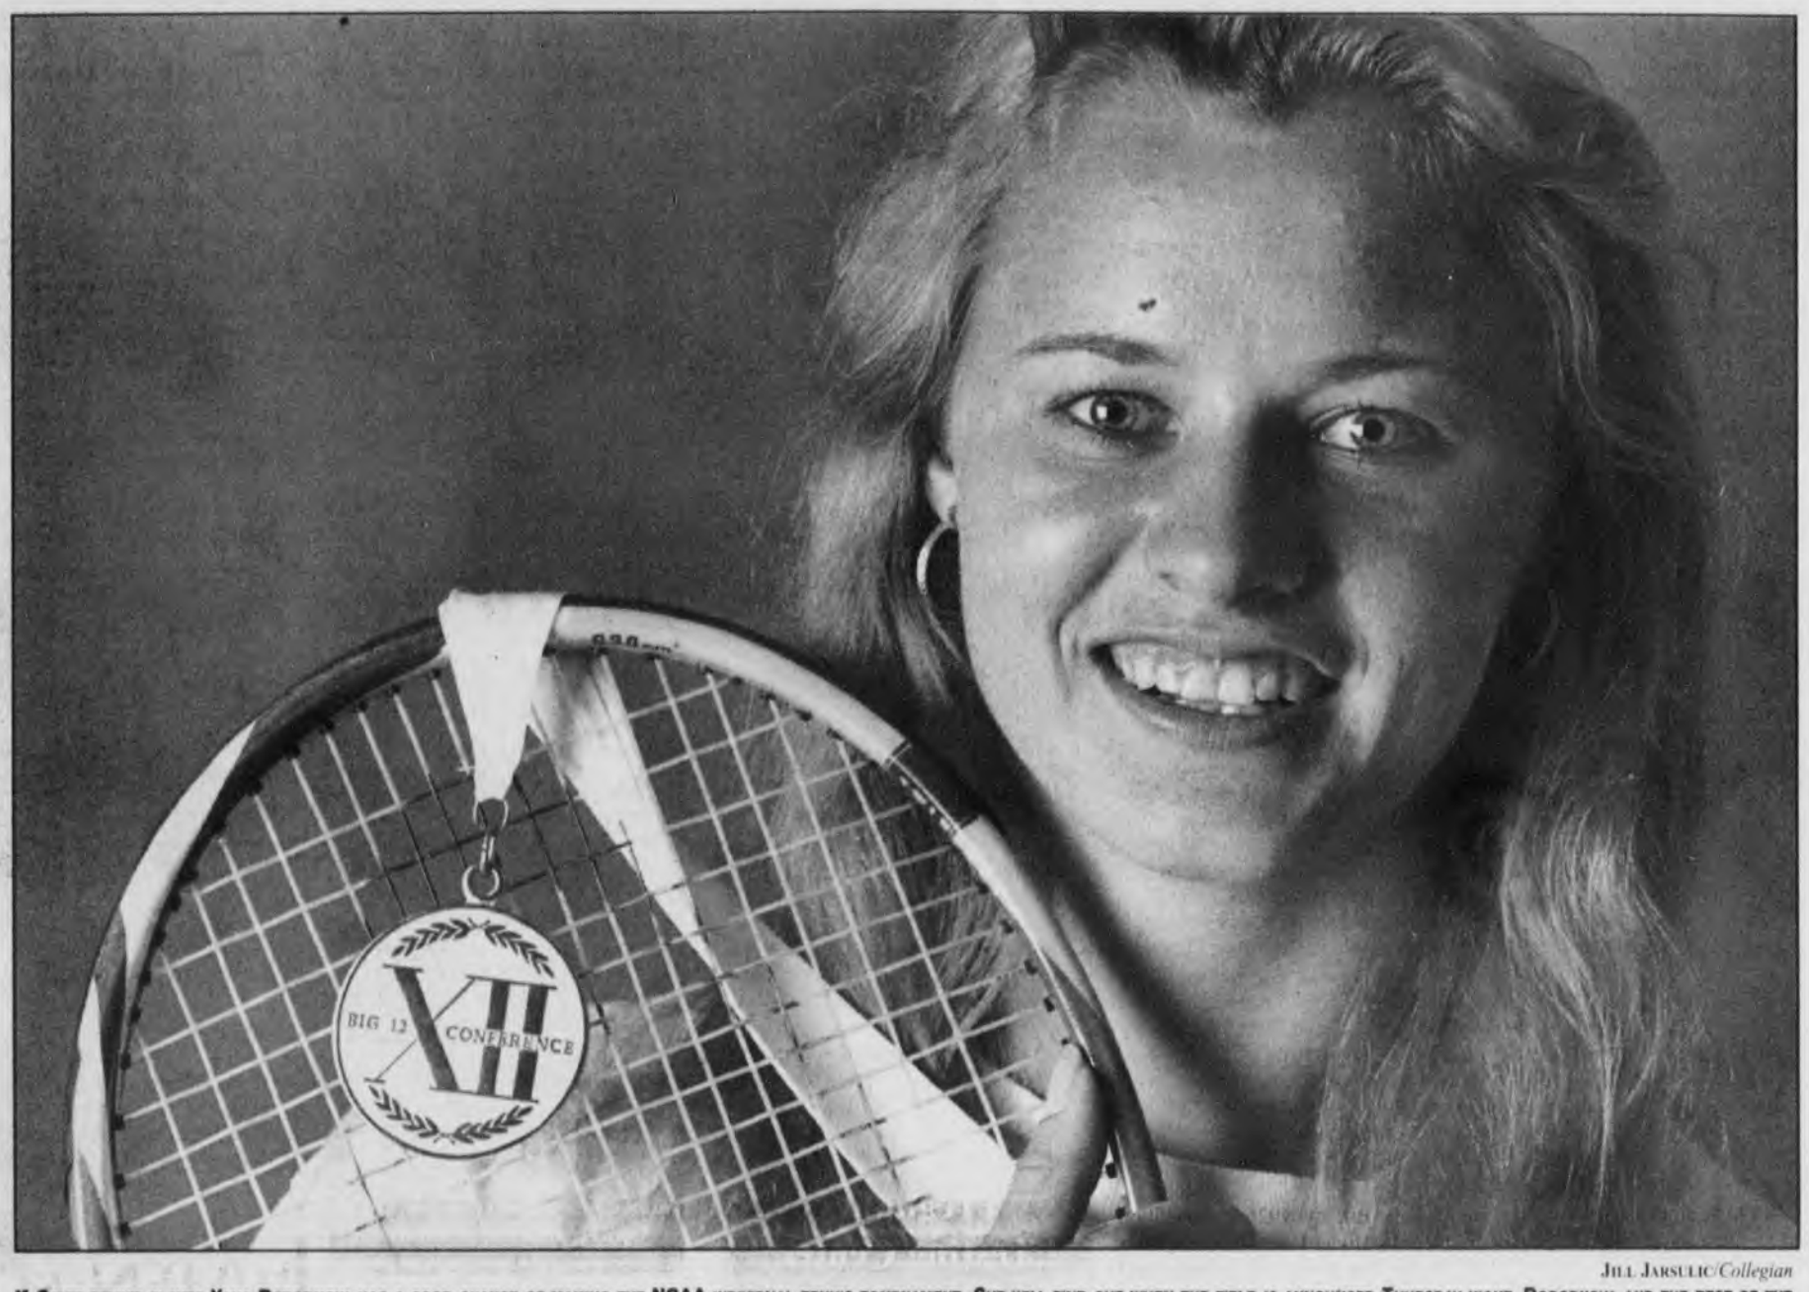
According to the newspaper, only 11.1 percent of the $4 million spent by USC in athletic operating expenses during the 1996-97 academic year was spent on women's teams, while women made up 42.5 percent of all student-athletes.

In addition, the Register said, documents show that female athletes received only 34 percent of the $5.5 million the school awarded in athletic-related financial aid in 1996-97.

According to the newspaper, USC ranks last in the Pac-10 in gender equity. The Register reported the budget for women's sports at USC is $3.6 million; the men's budget is $11.9 million.

Title IX requires that scholarship dollars be distributed to male and female athletes in proportion to their participation in athletics.

"They're absolutely out of compliance in terms of scholarships," Women's Sports Foundation executive director Donna Lopiano, a USC Ph. D., was quoted as saying. "The law says if women make up 42 percent of the athletes, they must have 42 percent of the scholarships. That's absolutely clear. They're breaking the law.



"They're probably in the bottom 10 percent of all schools in terms of operating expenses."

By failing to comply, the Register said, USC runs the risk of being cut off from some or all of the $200 million the university receives annually in various federal grants that fund non-athletic programs as well as sports.

However, senior associate athletic director Lisa Love said the Register's story did not present a balanced look at the strides the school has made in Title IX compliance and it did not include a complete perspective of the NCAA numbers.

K-STATE TENNIS PLAYER YANA DORODNOVA HAS A GOOD CHANCE OF MAKING THE NCAA INDIVIDUAL TENNIS TOURNAMENT. SHE WILL FIND OUT WHEN THE FIELD IS ANNOUNCED THURSDAY NIGHT. DORODNOVA AND THE REST OF THE WOMEN'S TEAM QUALIFIED FOR THE NATIONAL NCAA TOURNAMENT.

Dorodnova leads Cats into NCAA Tournament battle

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State tennis team's bubble hopes were answered late Tuesday night when it found out it had qualified for the national NCAA Tournament.

The No. 47 Wildcats (11-11) open their tournament play against the No. 25 New Mexico Lobos (20-4) next Thursday in the quarterfinals of the Central Region.

The Cats finished the season winning five of their final six matches to put them on the bubble for a tournament bid.

"We knew we had a few wins that would help us and that we didn't have any bad losses," Yana Dorodnova said. "We thought that our chances were 50-50."

Key wins at the end of the year in close matches over Baylor and Nebraska might have been the wins that put K-State in the tournament.

The Cats are now the No. 6 seed in the Central Region.

The remainder of the regional is made up of Arizona, Kansas, Utah, Colorado, Oklahoma, Boise State and New Mexico, the Cats' first-round opponent.

Contributions from all areas of the lineup have put the Cats in the tournament for only the second time in school history, Dorodnova said.

At No. 6 singles, Dinah Watson has been a force all year going 8-1 at that position.

Martina Pospisilova, who joined the team in early March, also has been impressive in the middle of the lineup.

She compiled a 6-2 record at No. 3 singles before moving up to the No. 2 spot for the final meet of the regular season and the Big 12 Tournament.

At No. 3 doubles, Watson and Anna Pampoulova have racked up nine victories together, often giving the Cats much-needed points in doubles.

However, the key to this team all season has been the play of Dorodnova at No. 1 singles.

She is ranked No. 47 in the national. She has beaten many quality opponents in acquiring her 15-5 record this year.

Her highest profile victory came against Holly Parkinson of BYU. Parkinson is ranked No. 10 after having been as high as No. 4 in the nation.

However, Dorodnova said she is most proud of her win over Kansas' Kylie Hunt in the recent Big 12 Tournament.

Hunt is ranked in the top 25, but at one time in her college career had the No. 1 position in the country.

In addition to those key victories, Dorodnova has four other victories against ranked opponents.

Dorodnova has the goal of reaching the individual NCAA Tournament as well.

The top-64 players are selected and Dorodnova said she felt as though she has a good chance to make the field announced on Thursday night.

She said she has believed she could make the tournament since early in the season when she won a tough match against Utah's top player, Anna Svedenhov.

"After my win over Svedenhov, I started to think I could make the tournament," Dorodnova said. "I just needed to stay at that same level."

Avoiding injuries has been a problem for Dorodnova in previous seasons, but this year she has been healthy. She said that, combined with help from new assistant coach Robert Novotny on her serve, has been the key to her success this year.

"My serve and net play have been the best part of my game," Dorodnova said. "Robert Novotny has helped me with my serve and made it much better."

If the Cats win out in the Central Region, they will move on to the NCAA Finals in South Bend, Ind.

There, they will be able to keep Dorodnova company if she is selected for the individual tournament.

A first-round victory over the Lobos in Provo, Utah, could set up a possible K-State vs. KU match for the third time this season. The Cats have lost to the Jayhawks twice this year. Most recently the Cats were bounced by the Jayhawks in the Big 12 Tournament in a close meet.

The Jayhawks meet Oklahoma in the first round of the regional.

Columnist experiences no shortage of highs or lows while at K-State

AUTHOR'S NOTE: The outline for this column is a direct rip-off of my good friend and ex-Collegian sports columnist Shane McCormick's last column last spring. I hope he won't care, and I hope you don't, either.

This time, I mean it.

It's my last Collegian sports column. I'm done, and I won't appear here again. I promise.

And, no, I still don't have a job.

Not that I'm bitter. My roommate — an engineer who has NO experience in her field — landed a sweet internship paying big bucks. She'll probably have a job waiting for her when she graduates.

Just because 127 million other people want to do what I want to do means my résumé tapes and article clips are sitting on news directors' and sports editors' desks, gathering dust.

But I digress. This is supposed to be a column about my best and worst moments as a sports writer at K-State. I guess my not having a job yet would be a low. Let's move on to happier times.

HIGH — Being on the field for the last minutes of the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. (The last five minutes of every game, the press is allowed on the field to watch).

If I do this job for the next 100 years, I never will take this privilege for granted — the crashing of pads, the screaming coaches, the trash-talking, jubilant (or sorrowful) players on the sidelines. Seeing up-close the faces of the Wildcats as they hugged and high-fived each other after the win was a moment I will treasure.

LOW — The last minutes of the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl. I stood in the end zone where Kevin Lockett made that incredible catch out-of-bounds. I stood so close, I could hear his heart break.

HIGH — KU 62, K-State 59. Jan. 4, 1997, in Bramlage Coliseum. Mark Young didn't score a point for the first 16 minutes of the game but came back to shave the Hawks' 10-point lead as the first half ended.

The Cats lost, not scoring the go-ahead basket in four attempts, but it was definitely the best game I've ever seen in person — the most effort the team put forth in the two years I covered it.

LOW — The nonexistent Fiesta Bowl sign on I-70. Come on, KDOT — you have nine days until graduation. Get it up there so this can be a high.

HIGH — The women's basketball team's defeat of KU in the Big 12 Tournament, March 6, 1997.

Deb Patterson's first K-State team, scheduled to go nowhere in particular, went all the way to the NCAA Tournament for the first time in 10 years. It became one of the school's best Cinderella stories, and I was proud to be a part of it.

PERSONAL NOTE: Deb Patterson is one of the nicest, easiest-to-talk-to coaches on this campus. She made my job much easier in the two years I covered the team. Thanks, Deb, and good luck.

LOW — Meeting Willie the Wildcat. I was disillusioned. No point losing your head over not knowing who he is — wait. He lost his head at the Colorado game in Bramlage on Jan. 25. If I'd seen that, it would've been a high.

HIGH — Meeting Kansas City Monarch player Buck O'Neil. As the incoming sports editor, I attended an Associated Press conference last summer where he was the keynote speaker.

He spoke of how hard it was for him back in his day and correlated it to the challenges a sports writer faces. He singled me out, being the only woman in the crowd, and said my road would be the roughest.

As he left the room, he gave me an encouraging hug. One of the most touching moments in my career.

LOW — Pay at the Collegian. One day we figured it in hours, and it's so small, it won't even show up in 10-point type in this column.

HIGH — Meeting the president of the Southwest Kansas Stalkers' Association. And he's not really stalking me. Honest.

LOW — Making mistakes in print. It's something journalists do on a regular basis, and me being the bull-headed perfectionist that I am, it's hard for me to deal with when it happens.

When I made some of my more stupid ones, I heard from readers in some constructive and some not-constructive ways. I appreciated the people who took the time to be intelligent and wished I could find the people who wrote e-mails from World Wide Web sites that were impossible to trace. I had a lot to say to you chickens.

HIGH — The moments people took time to e-mail positive comments, good suggestions and job tips. As columnists, we're told the public doesn't care what we think.

We're just supposed to relate our "expert" opinion to make people think.

Well, I write about what I care about, and some of my favorite columns — the KU football column, the Tom Osborne column, the women in sports journalism column and the recent baseball column — got responses that make me feel like getting a job in this field is something I actually could do. So when it does happen, I have you all to thank.

LOW — Leaving K-State now. I won't be a student here Nov. 14. Purple, get ready to roll.

Chrysler considering merger with Mercedes-Benz makers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — Chrysler Corp., a flag-waving champion of the Buy American movement that once staved off bankruptcy with a government bailout, is discussing a merger with Germany's biggest industrial company, the maker of the Mercedes-Benz.

The talks reportedly give Chrysler a $35 billion sticker price, meaning a combination of Daimler-Benz and the No. 3 American automaker would be the biggest U.S. industrial merger ever.

Combining the German luxury-car maker with the pioneer of middle-class minivans not only would bring together makers of two different classes of autos, but also would broaden the global reach of both companies significantly.

Chrysler would get greater access to the European market, something it has sought, while Daimler-Benz would gain a bigger foothold in the American market, where it has been working to increase sales.

"To some extent there is a hand-in-glove fit," said Scott Merlis, an analyst with Merlis Automotive International. "I would say it looks like a match made in heaven to the extent the two cultures can co-exist."

Some said the greatest threat to the deal could be a clash between Daimler's buttoned-down managers and the more freewheeling culture at Chrysler.

In a statement Wednesday after The Wall Street Journal reported the talks, the two automakers said a deal is far from certain.

The news blindsided industry watchers. While they knew Chrysler and BMW spoke of a deal last year, few realized Chrysler and Daimler-Benz were talking.

The move would be a stark change from Chrysler officials' past advocacy of "Buy American," which was especially strong after the automaker went to the brink of bankruptcy in 1979 and was rescued in 1980 when President Carter signed a law giving it $1.5 billion in federal loan guarantees. Chrysler paid off the loans in 1983, seven years early.

For years, Lee Iacocca, then Chrysler chairman, urged consumers to "buy American." In the early 1980s, when he introduced the "K cars," he used the catchphrase that America was not going to be pushed around anymore. As recently as 1990 he argued in a TV commercial that American cars were good as those made in Japan.

The United Auto Workers said it is pursuing information about the talks and the possible effects of a merger on members. The Canadian Auto Workers said a merger would position the companies to take advantage of a global market and should not be viewed as a threat.

Phil Gott, auto industry analyst at DRI McGraw Hill, said U.S. car sales will "grow very slowly, if at all, over the next five years. So in order to grow their business, Chrysler does need to go global, and Mercedes gives them access to Europe and other parts of the world quite easily."

Mercedes-Benz has increased U.S. sales 67 percent this year, largely with the help of its hot-selling M-Class sport utility vehicle. But the German automaker is still a bit player in the United States, with a market share of little more than 1 percent.

Similarly, Chrysler sold only 17,713 vehicles outside North America last month, more than half of that in Europe. Chrysler sold nearly 221,000 vehicles in the United States last month.

While the combination gives both companies an opportunity to cut costs — a priority in an industry that hasn't been able to raise prices — analysts said they doubt dealerships will be combined to the point that Mercedes cars are sold side-by-side with Chrysler minivans.

Daimler's stock rose 6 1/2 to 108 9/16 on the New York Stock Exchange on Wednesday. Chrysler surged 7 3/8 1/2 to 48 13/16, giving the automaker a market value of $31.5 billion.

Chrysler has 94,300 employees in the United States and a 16-percent share of new vehicle sales in the United States this year. Only General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. sell more, with shares of 31 percent and 24 percent, respectively.

In addition to autos, Daimler is also involved in aerospace, defense and financial services.

The company was incorporated near Stuttgart in 1890 as Daimler Engine, ten years later it sold 36 race cars to Austro-Hungarian Emil Jellinek, who insisted they be named after his daughter Mercedes. The cars won a race in 1901, and the name was adopted as a trademark a year later.

Benz & Co. was set up in Mannheim in 1883 and by 1899 was the world's top automaker. But by 1926, competition from Ford's Model T and the disruptions of World War I pushed Daimler and Benz into a merger in 1926.

Campus police remove solicitors

▶ SHOP CLOSED DOWN FOR NOT REGISTERING WITH FACILITIES PRIOR TO USING GROUNDS.

K-State Police on Wednesday shut down a two-man operation that had been giving bogus "South Park" T-shirts to students who would stop and fill out a Mastercard application.

The T-shirts featured a blue sketch of the "South Park" character Cartman. Underneath the character was the name "Carmen" in blue lettering. Also, the T-shirts were double-tagged with a marker used by T-shirt manufacturers to distinguish flawed T-shirts.

Tuesday, the unidentified pair set up shop in front of Denison Hall, and Wednesday they branched out to a second location between Waters Hall and Cardwell Hall.

The solicitors failed to register with the Division of Facilities. A one-week advance notice and approval by the University Activities Board is required for any group wanting to register for use of university grounds. Neither had any comment on their removal, except to say they thought they had received the appropriate permission.

University officials said they received no prior notification from the solicitors.

"Nothing came through us," said Loleta Sump, facilities manager in charge of scheduling.

The two were asked to remove their wares from campus by K-State Police.

"It happens every now and then, a group not registering with Dykstra," said Lt. Dave Johnson of the campus police. "They were in violation of university policy. No criminal charges can be filed."

Mastercard officials were unavailable to verify the solicitors' claims.

Members allege sexual harassment

"The time is past due to be held accountable for this type of behavior."

Hopper said in addition to the Code of Conduct manual, Kirkland keeps a misconduct book, and based on this information, any student can be denied tryouts the following year.

"This is merely the tip of the iceberg when it comes to politics within the squad," Hopper said. "With the fear of removal established, the coach is able to implement his other self-serving goals."

Kyle Tammen, December 1997 graduate in secondary education and Spanish, spent six years on the K-State Cheer Squad. As a varsity squad member in 1995, the team placed seventh in nationals.

Tammen worked as 1996-97 junior varsity coach when Kirkland was hired as head cheerleading coach.

He said although he had heard rumors about Kirkland, he chose not to get involved directly.

"Instead of earning respect, he just demanded it," Tammen said. "I never really talked about this because I was concerned about my goals and getting the squad to nationals."

As a former K-State cheerleader, Tammen said he understands the pressure students feel to stay on the squad.

"It's such a big part of your life, and no one wants to jeopardize this," Tammen said. "These girls are all idolized and looked up to all over campus and yet they have very low self-esteem. They don't want to lose what they've worked for. For some, being a cheerleader at the college level is their dream, and they're living it."

Because Kirkland's Code of Conduct manual states that any member of the squad breaking the chain of command is subject to immediate dismissal or suspension, cheerleaders might feel powerless to complain, Tammen said.

"That's why girls don't come forward. They don't want to lose the position and have everyone looking down on them," Tammen said. "The two squads mix socially and yes, I heard things. There is no reason to make things up."

Tammen said as both a teacher and a coach, he understands the importance of maintaining a distance with the students.

"It's a coed squad, and you learn from being a teacher that there has to be a line between the students and yourself. You have to make sure you treat the men and women equally," Tammen said.

There were a few unofficial rules in place to help build trust and the team relationship, Tammen said.

"I was told there wasn't suppose to be a relationship on the squad and if there was between two cheerleaders, you left it outside," Tammen said. "As a coach, you just don't do that at all.

"You don't date people on your squad, and you don't date people in your classroom. You have to respect that you have this influence and keep it separate."

Code of Conduct defines chain of command

who will take advantage of a situation," Hopper said. "He will ostracize you if you go over his head. There are measures of control he exercises that the athletic department should not be endorsing."

Steve Kirkland, cheer coach and assistant events manager, said the chain of command section was changed as of last fall. However, Kirkland said all 1997-98 cheerleaders did sign the code of conduct, and the revisions to the five-page manual still are not complete.

"This was in for a month or two, and then I took it out. It's always subject to change," Kirkland said. "I have changed it to be standard with all the other athletic teams."

Kirkland said the intent of the manual was to inform all cheerleaders about rules and regulations, in addition to duties and expectations.

"It wasn't perfect when we wrote it," Kirkland said. "You still need to go through a chain of command. Now, if I don't solve something for them, they have another avenue."

Kirkland wouldn't specify other avenues.

Dave Cox joined the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics as an assistant athletics director in June 1997. He shares an office with Kirkland and said the chain of command is in place to give cheerleaders a chance to report concerns.

"You go to a coach first, I don't have any problems with that," Cox said. "Each coach is responsible for the conduct of their team. Some coaches are very specific about the rules."

Cox said any misgivings about the chain of command were merely confusing semantics for the general meaning.

"It's put in there for the protection of the cheerleaders," Cox said. "The reason that's in there is to give cheerleaders a chance to go up the ladder. What you have is an opportunity to go above it and appeal it."

Kyle Tammen, graduate in secondary education and Spanish, spent six years on the K-State cheerleading squad before working as the 1996-97 junior varsity coach.

Tammen said he doubted the athletic department would endorse such a chain of command, but he said it's unlikely members of the cheer squad would complain.

"They like cheering so much, but there's a fear. He has this chain of command set up so they cannot talk," Tammen said.

The cheer squad, formerly operating under the KSU Bands Department umbrella, has moved to the athletic department and gained more autonomy.

"The athletic department doesn't really oversee us or monitor the squads," Tammen said. "If he wants to cut somebody or move them down, they have no choice. It gives him too much power. It's such an important thing, and no one wants to jeopardize this."

Tammen said the athletic department needs to become more involved in overseeing the cheer squad.

"I do like that we're autonomous but in the right hands. In the hands of a great coach, it's good to have that freedom," Tammen said. "I don't want them to lose that, but the athletic department needs to know what's going on before it gets this out of hand again."

MITSUGI OHNO, MASTER GLASS BLOWER FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF CHEMISTRY FROM 1961 TO 1996, HAS TWO EXHIBITS OF HIS GLASS-BLOWING CRAFT ON CAMPUS. FAMOUS SHIPS AND BUILDINGS THAT OHNO HAS RECREATED OUT OF GLASS CAN BE FOUND IN THE K-STATE STUDENT UNION AND CHEMISTRY/BIOCHEMISTRY BUILDING.

Brochure features glass blower's works

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Last Sunday, master glass blower Mitsugi Ohno was fishing at Tuttle Creek Reservoir and had such good luck he brought home a basketful of crappie.

His method for success?

After being asked where he fishes to have such good fortune, Ohno said, "A secret fishing place."

In the past, it seemed like finding the 10 or so of Ohno's glass works strung throughout campus has been like finding his secret fishing place.

There are two clusters of his work, one on the first floor of the K-State Student Union and another in the Chemistry/Biochemistry building.

As a result of Ohno donating his work to the university, K-State has produced a brochure guide to finding his work on campus. Produced by the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and available at its information desk, the brochure describes Ohno's background and expresses his intention that his work be on exhibition.

Borrowing from a Japanese poem and speaking in a heavy accent from his native Japan, Ohno said, "When a tiger dies, you save the skin. When people die, the name is important. That's what I want to do for the art museum. I'm very happy that the university has that kind of collection."

Born in Tochigi, Japan, in 1926, Ohno apprenticed with an uncle to learn the glass-blowing craft. He worked as the glass blower of the K-State Department of Chemistry from 1961 to 1996, when he retired to commit full-time to his hobby craft. Ohno's work is included in the collections of the White House, the Smithsonian Institution, the Eisenhower Library and the Imperial Palace in Japan.

The pieces on display in the Chemistry/Biochemistry building include scale models of the Mayflower, the Santa Maria, the Niña, the Pinta and the U.S.S. Constitution. Ohno said he is dedicating the last years of his life strictly to working on ships. Crafting buildings — he's done everything from the White House to the U.S. Capitol to Anderson Hall — became old hat because for the most part, they're structurally simple, he said.

His current piece, which has been in the works for two years, is the H.M.S. Victory. It now sits in Ohno's basement studio, really a corner where the master has his stash of glass strips, tools and design drawings that he eyes while constructing the ship. The Victory has 104 cannons, dozens of sails and an intricate figurehead on the mast. He said he hopes to have it done by September.

Ohno said his greatest wish is for the chemistry department to purchase a larger oven, at an estimated cost of $23,000, so he can make larger pieces that are more structurally sound. For example, Ohno said his U.S.S. Missouri in the Union was created and baked in two pieces, therefore the possibility exists for structural failure in the connecting joint.

Forum to show reknown claymation film

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

After film critic Terry Lawson saw the film series to be shown at K-State tonight and Saturday, he called two of its featured characters "the funniest comic team in movies of any description."

Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin? Chris Farley and David Spade? Not likely.

The comedy duo that has generated the most attention from the British anthology is composed of the inventor Wallace and his dog Gromit, both of whom are made of oil-based clay.

▶ More info? "Wallace and Gromit: The Best of Aardman Animation," will be shown at 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. today and at 10 p.m. Saturday in Forum Hall. Admission is $1.75.

Although the short-film compilation will include nine different Claymation films by the Aardman Studio of England, most of the people who have expressed interest in the series have been fans of Wallace and Gromit, said Heide McBride, program adviser for Union Program Council.

"I've heard of a lot of students that just really like it," McBride said.

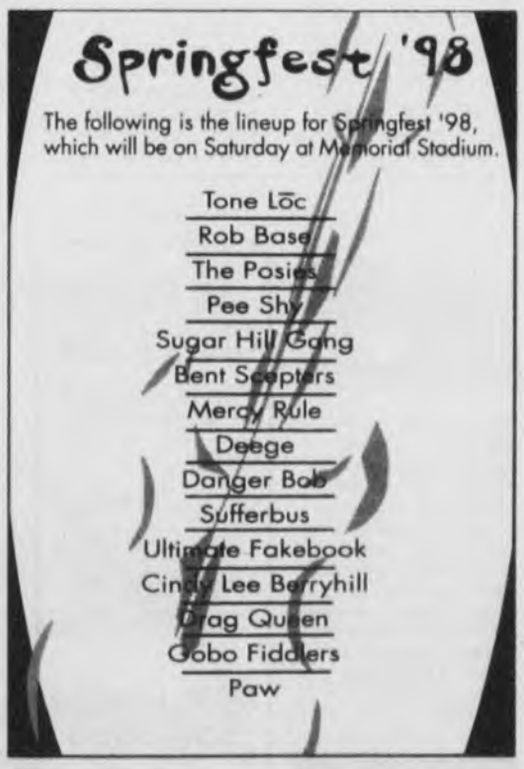
The characters' creator, Nick Park, won an Academy Award in 1989 for Best Animated Short Film for "Creature Comforts," about a group of zoo animals being interviewed, and again in 1996 for the Wallace and Gromit film "A Close Shave," in which Wallace's automatic window-washing machine leads to Gromit's arrest for sheep rustling. Both of these will be part of the anthology.

Park, who also worked on the Peter Gabriel video "Sledgehammer," is known for clean animation because he moves each model 24 times per second. In fact, his audiences typically forget the method and fall in love with the characters, Lawson said.

"Park creates a Claymation universe so real that even Wallace's outlandish inventions seem believable," Lawson wrote in a 1996 review of "A Close Shave."

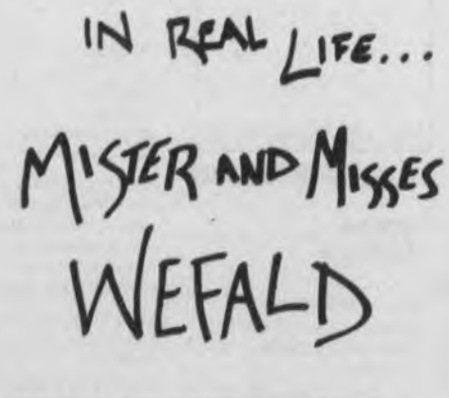
"But in the end, it's the characters, not the technique, we love."

Georgia Hebert of Manhattan said she has seen many animated and Claymation films, and the three Wallace and Gromit shorts are some of her favorites.



"It's by far the best Claymation I've seen," Hebert said.

She said she enjoyed Gromit's animated facial expressions so much, she named her cat after him.



"The best thing about the series is Gromit the dog has no mouth, and he has the best facial features," she said.

McBride said she had seen another of the Wallace and Gromit films, which she enjoyed.

"If you like British humor, it's funny," she said.

Clinton rejects comparisons to Watergate in executive privilege claims, might appeal

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Fighting ghosts of Watergate, President Clinton on Wednesday rejected comparisons between his executive-privilege claim and Richard Nixon's battle to keep taped conversations private.

"The facts are quite different in this case," the president said.

In a news conference with Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi, the president also refused to say whether he would appeal a court ruling that denied his petition to keep aides from testifying in the Monica Lewinsky investigation.

With the executive-privilege case under seal, Clinton said his attorneys had asked the judge to open to the public his arguments in the matter.

Several lawyers familiar with the decision by U.S. District Judge Norma Holloway Johnson said Tuesday the ruling means senior presidential aides, such as Bruce Lindsey and Sidney Blumenthal, must answer certain grand jury questions they previously had refused in a showdown with prosecutor Kenneth Starr.

Shortly before the news conference, the president's legal team discussed its response to the court ruling.

Clinton is almost certain to appeal, according to officials close to the legal team.

The action may not be filed for several days, they said.

Asked if he would appeal, Clinton said at the news conference, "I can't comment on it."

A reporter also questioned him about the difference between his case and Nixon's executive privilege claim, which was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court shortly before the Republican president's 1974 resignation.

"I would also remind you that the facts are quite different in this case," Clinton said.

"How so?" he was asked, but the president did not respond.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry was asked about Watergate comparisons earlier in the day, said of Clinton: "I don't think he's worried about any parallels to Watergate because there are none.

"In the case of Watergate, crimes were committed, as you may recall," McCurry said.

At the height of the Watergate scandal in the summer of 1974, the Supreme Court took about six weeks to vote to uphold U.S. District Judge John Sirica's decision against President Nixon.

Nixon invoked executive privilege to deny access to tape-recorded conversations in the White House.

Nixon resigned five weeks after the Supreme Court ruled against him amid impeachment proceedings in the House.

In related matters:

• Betty Currie, President Clinton's personal secretary and a central figure in the Lewinsky case, arrived Wednesday at the federal courthouse where it was expected she would give testimony for a second time to the grand jury.

• Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., jettisoned a top aide, David Bossie, from his investigatory committee in an effort to quell controversy over the release of Webster Hubbell's Whitewater-related prison phone calls.

One of the lawyers familiar with the ruling, all of whom spoke only on condition of anonymity, said the judge ruled that prosecutors' interest in obtaining relevant testimony in the Lewinsky matter outweighed that of the president's in protecting the confidentiality of advice he receives.

The decision, filed Monday, was just the latest in a string of legal obstacles that Starr has overcome in the past two weeks.

The Whitewater independent counsel also has secured grand jury indictments against two former presidential friends, Susan McDougal and Webster Hubbell, and won a separate ruling rejecting Lewinsky's claim she had a guarantee of complete immunity from prosecution.

Still pending is a ruling from Johnson on whether Secret Service agents should have to testify about what they observed and heard from the president — an untested legal area.

After two weeks of concentrating on the Arkansas aspects of their investigation, Whitewater prosecutors Tuesday shifted their focus back to the Lewinsky case by summoning presidential friend Vernon Jordan before the Washington grand jury for a third time.

Tiny guns pose threat to airport security

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A tiny firearm that looks like a key chain has joined the arsenal of offbeat and homemade weapons challenging airport security screeners. The Federal Aviation Administration said it is confident it can detect them all.

"All I can say is that we have appropriate security measures in place, and everyone is aware of this weapon," FAA spokeswoman Rebecca Trexler said.

The $20 pistol, 3 inches long and an inch wide, is capable of firing two .32-caliber rounds and could be deadly from 20 yards.

Designed to ward off attackers by firing gas cartridges, the weapon is cocked by pulling a ring at the rear and fired by pushing a button.

Because the weapon resembles a key chain, it presents a unique security threat. Key chains, coins and other metal objects often are thrown into baskets that go around airport X-ray machines.

Even when the key-chain firearm passes through an X-ray scanner, its simple shape and low metal content makes it difficult for screeners to identify as a weapon.

"It doesn't look like a weapon. If you showed it to airport security, they would probably think it's a key ring," Brian Hurrell, director of customs in Perth, Australia, told The New York Times, which reported on the gun Wednesday.

The FAA, responsible for U.S. aviation security, said it was warned about the weapon this year by Greek officials. It since has warned all airlines and airport managers.

"Beyond that, we can't discuss our security arrangements at any of our facilities, because that would serve as a guide for the terrorists," Trexler said.

Numerous handmade and disguised weapons are found at airport check-in sites each year, although Trexler would not cite specifics.

Overall, 1.4 billion people were screened at U.S. airports in 1996, and 2,147 firearms were discovered. There has not been a hijacking involving a U.S. carrier since 1991.

Billie Vincent, former head of security for the FAA, said that while the tiny gun is troublesome, it is no more dangerous than knives concealed in umbrella handles or Derringers built into large belt buckles.

Both have been detected in the past.

Undergraduate works to change USDA cooking recommendations and wipe whatever it is you're using," Phebus said. "That's going to be very adequate."

Phebus also suggested wiping off the thermometer with a mixture of one teaspoon of bleach to 16 ounces of water, then rinsing off the thermometer with water.

According to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment's Food Service Establishment Regulations, ground beef prepared in restaurants is required to be cooked to 155 degrees — 5 degrees below Killinger's recommended internal temperature for ground beef prepared at home.

Killinger said as long as the restaurant is keeping the temperature at 155 degrees for 15 seconds, it is equivalent to cooking it to 160 degrees.

"In a restaurant, they aren't even supposed to ask you how you want your hamburger cooked anymore," she said. "They should just cook it to medium, at least."

Killinger said 160 degrees is a medium degree of doneness. She said she doesn't always ask what constitutes doneness when she's ordering a hamburger at a restaurant, but if she had children, she would.

"The most susceptible people that pathogens can affect are children, the very old and the immuno-compromised," she said.

Killinger uses a thermometer when she prepares hamburgers at home, even though the presence of bacteria in ground beef is low.

"I don't want people to be scared, because it's really not that common," she said.

"When it does happen, there's so much of a panic over it and it's made such a big deal of, that people worry. People should be concerned with preparing ground beef properly," Killinger said.

"It concerns me that more people don't know how to prepare hamburgers safely."

was his friend Karl Kramer, adjunct professor of biochemistry and research chemist at the United States Grain Marketing and Production Research Center. Ohno said Kramer "is my good friend. He knows my thinking on everything."

Kramer has been a longtime advocate of Ohno's work at the university.

"I think not very many people know that this stuff is on campus," Kramer said. "People come on campus and want to see this and they need to know how to find it."

He said there isn't really a custodian of the work on display, although some faculty of the chemistry department do keep an eye on it.

Referring to earlier efforts to get Ohno's work displayed in the art museum, Kramer said "They really haven't given him the space he deserves."

He said there have been some fundraising attempts in Japan to get sponsorship of a permanent facility, but nothing has come of it.

Ohno also has a friend in Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, who, as a member of the museum's board, helped to get the brochure produced.

"Given the size of the work, there's just no way we could fit it in our small art museum," Reagan said. "It would be a shame to have it in storage."

Ohno is definitely proud of the brochure.

"I want to spend the rest of my life making ships for the art museum," Ohno said. "To make a famous collection, that's my dream."

School obligated to look into charges, official says

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

In light of allegations of sexual harassment against Steve Kirkland, coach of the K-State Cheer Squad, officials have said the Office of Affirmative Action and Dean of Student Life are prepared to help any student.

Clyde Howard, director of Office of Affirmative Action, said even if a student chooses not to pursue action after a complaint of sexual harassment is made, the university has a responsibility to investigate.

"We are still obligated to take action to make sure the harassment doesn't happen again," Howard said.

"The focus initially is to inform the student of their right to learn in an harassment-free environment. The university is obligated to act on any quid-pro-quo situation when sexual favors are being requested to get something."

KIRKLAND

The K-State policy prohibiting sexual harassment is outlined on pages 44-46 of the Student Life Handbook in the 1997-1998 Campus Connections Phonebook.

The handbook defines sexual harassment as, "any behavior which, through inappropriate sexual content or disparagement of members of one sex, interferes with an individual's work or learning environment."

Sexual harassment is further defined as any intimidation by threat, overt or implicit, that any educational decision might be affected by an unwillingness to tolerate or accept sexual attention.

According to the handbook, students should report behavior constituting sexual harassment when, "A person is required to tolerate or accept sexual attentions as a condition of employment or learning." It also states, "The behavior creates an environment that is intimidating, hostile, or offensive for members of one sex, and thus interferes with a person's ability to work or learn."

K-State's policy against sexual harassment is a policy against discrimination. To report sexual harassment, students should contact a university administrator responsible for the department or other unit in which the harassment is believed to have occurred. Complaints against other students should be reported to the Dean of Student Life office.

Carla Jones, associate dean of student life, said there is typically one allegation of sexual harassment a year.

"Usually, it's one student who feels they are discriminated against because of their gender," Jones said.

"The more typical complaints are 'The person made me feel uncomfortable by giving me a hug' or some type of inappropriate touching."

Allegations of sexual harassment at K-State have included complaints about content of class material, persistently requesting dates, inappropriate touching and sexually oriented comments.

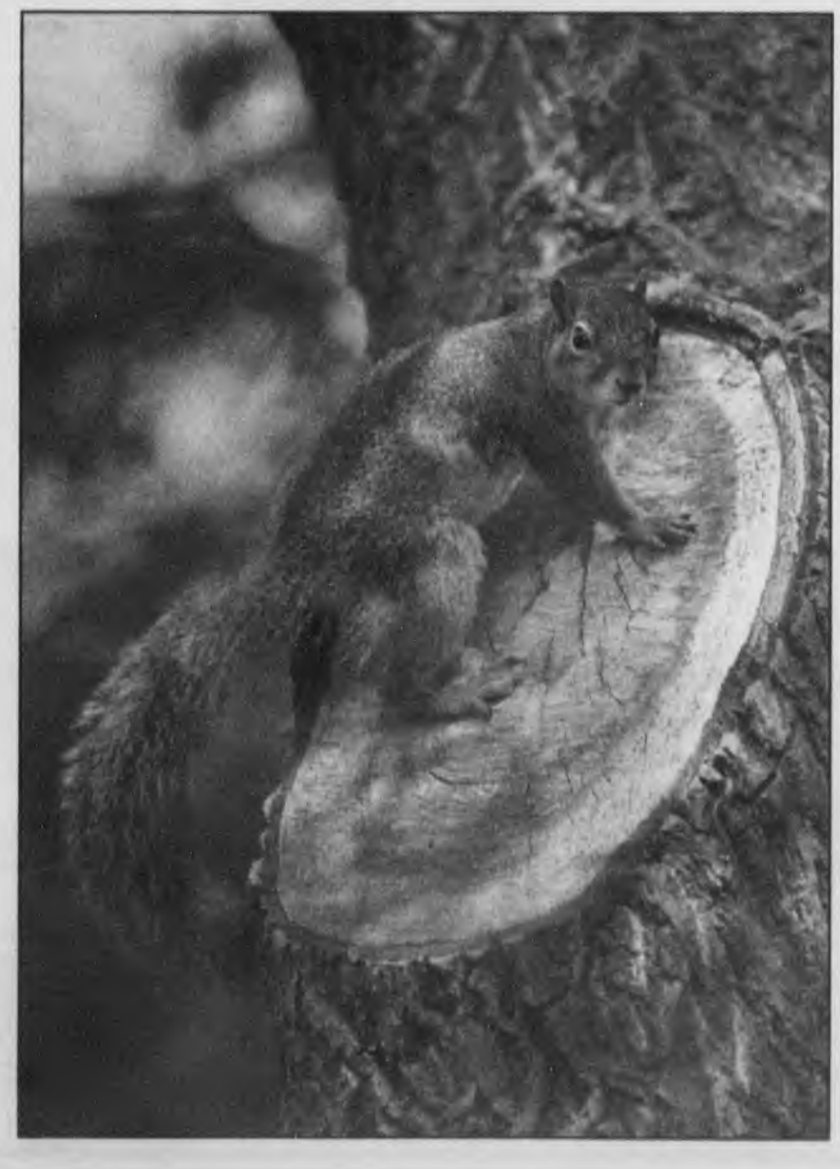
Jones said all allegations of sexual harassment are taken seriously and every effort is taken to keep the student safe. The student works directly with an administrator during the process before a written statement is made and sent to the Office of Affirmative Action.

"Our process is confidential. In some cases, the person who brings the complaint doesn't definitely have to be in the same room during the hearing. It's more of a fact-finding hearing," Jones said.

"My philosophy is 'try not to give students the run-around.' The good thing about our policy is that it's very specific so students know where to go and what their rights are."

The Women's Center, 206 Holton, offers students an opportunity to learn about their rights and policies against harassment on campus.

Elizabeth Crain, assistant interim director of the Women's Center, said students should ask for help if a particular situation or instructor makes them feel uncomfortable.



"At any point when they feel uncomfortable, odds are there's some type of sexual harassment going on," Crain said.

School ready to begin work on golf course

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Groundbreaking ceremonies for what will become K-State's golf course have been scheduled for 11 a.m. June 12.

K-State alumnus and PGA Senior Tour golfer Jim Colbert will lead the dedication of Colbert Hills, the 315-acre, 18-hole PGA Tour-caliber course.

The course is being constructed through a partnership of the PGA Tour Golf Course Properties Inc. and the Golf Course Superintendents Association of America. It will be owned and administrated by the nonprofit Kansas State University Golf Course Management and Research Foundation.

K-State Vice President of Institutional Advancement Bob Krause, the administrator at the spearhead of the project, said the course will cost $10 million and will be finished by spring 2000.

The land being developed for the course have been used as grazing land by Jack Vanier, president of the ranching company Western Star and Krause's father-in-law. Vanier is selling 315 acres of the roughly 1,000-acre plot just northwest of Manhattan city limits to the golf course foundation, and developing the rest as a housing development to be known as Grand Mere.

A new academic program for golf course superintendents, the first of its kind in history, will begin next fall at K-State. The course will be available for the program, as well as the K-State varsity golf team, a youth golf academy and the general public.

Krause said Colbert will be inducted into the Kansas Sports Hall of Fame on June 13, the day after he helps break the ground for Colbert Hills, along with representatives from PGA Tour, GCSAA and K-State dignitaries.

Staying cautious critical to safety, KSU police say

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students shouldn't be scared when they are alone on campus or leave their cars in campus parking lots.

But they should be aware, said Ronnie Grice, director of K-State Police.

K-State ranks third lowest in crime in the Big 12. Only the University of Colorado and Oklahoma State have less crime.

Grice said even though statistics show K-State has a relatively safe campus, students still should take precautions. Statistics show car burglaries are the most frequent type of crime at K-State. Grice said there is usually a group roving from place to place.

"They normally pick vehicles out they want to go after well in advance," he said.

Bumper stickers and window stickers sometimes give away to others what is in a car, Grice said. He said many people will put the name of the high-dollar stereo

Master plan passes group unanimously

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

The Campus Development Committee unanimously approved the new K-State master plan at its Thursday meeting, but not without further discussion about the state of the campus environment.

A recommendation from the committee to the university to hire a master planning consultant, which has resulted not in the university requesting $500,000 from the Kansas Board of Regents, was discussed as unlikely to occur.

Ed Rice is the associate vice president of administration and finance for facilities, and a committee member. He said he's not sure if the regents will approve the request, so the university is developing an alternate plan.

"We're looking at setting up some operational funds over a period of years to hire a consultant," Rice said.

Man escapes from Furnas County Jail, gets apprehended at grandfather's farm

BEAVER CITY, Neb. — A Kansas man escaped from jail but was surrounded by police at his grandfather's farm the next day and brought back into custody.

Police said Jerry Grigg, 23, was arrested Thursday. He was being kept in the Furnas County Jail on robbery, burglary and theft charges when his cell door on Wednesday night apparently did not lock properly.

A pickup truck reported stolen a block from the jail was found at the Webster County farm, which is two counties east of Furnas County in southern Nebraska.

Roberts wants to start agricultural trade with Iran, reduce military involvement

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States should scale back its military involvement in the Persian Gulf and Bosnia and start talking trade with Iran, Sen. Pat Roberts said after a 3-day trip to the region.

"I think we should study the possibility of using agriculture as a tool for peace," Roberts, R-Kan., said Wednesday.

"I like to follow advice by President Eisenhower: You might want to try to sell them anything they can't shoot back. I'm not suffering under any illusions; they are a rogue nation. But it seems to me this is an opportunity."

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, leader of the seven-senator delegation and chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, is seeking permission to proceed with plans for a visit to Iran from the State Department, which has shown resistance.

Overtures to the new Iranian government might be yet another way to try to isolate Saddam Hussein, lawmakers said.

The lawmakers said at a news conference that morale is slipping among American troops stationed in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, while forces in Bosnia have a more positive outlook.

Roberts said he will push to scale down and relocate the 8,000 or so U.S. troops in Bosnia, a strategic reserve policy that would allow them to respond should conflict arise.

He also is seeking to curtail the 35,800 American troops in the Gulf region.

Kuwaiti and Saudi Arabian officials don't want to shoulder more of the burden, senators said, and are willing for the United States to reduce its presence in their countries to the levels they were at before last winter's buildup in a confrontation with Iraq over U.N. weapons inspections.

Congress needs to "take a hard look at the funding for the military, because we're robbing the readiness account for all of these peacekeeping and nation-building exercises," Roberts said.

Lawmakers pushed a funding bill through Congress last week containing $1.3 billion for American troops in the Persian Gulf and nearly $500 million for U.S. peacekeeping forces in Bosnia.

Morale among the Gulf troops is low because they want to go home and don't have a return date.

"Clearly, I think it's time for us to reduce the deployment in the Persian Gulf and get it down to the point where people do not have to go back. One person told me he had gone back 11 times in the last eight years," Stevens said.

"One person said to me, 'I did not join the military to become part of the Foreign Legion.'"

Cheney man dies Tuesday after suffering from rare 'flesh-eating' strep infection

WICHITA — A Cheney man has died after suffering from a rare strep infection, often referred to as "flesh-eating bacteria."

Russell Moore, 68, died Tuesday at Via Christi Regional Medical Center-St. Francis Campus, a spokeswoman said Thursday.

He was admitted at the hospital in April and had undergone two operations to remove infected flesh from his leg and abdomen.

The virulent strep infections are rare; there are 500 to 1,500 cases annually nationwide.

At least 20 people have died since Dec. 1 in a recent outbreak of strep infections in Texas. Two of the deaths have been attributed to necrotizing fasciitis, in which the bacteria eats away flesh.

Moore's wife, Sylvia, had found a red spot on the back of his leg that resembled a spider bite, but there was no sign of a puncture. The Moores had been fighting what said they thought was the flu for about three weeks.

The virulent form of the strep causes a very rapid deterioration. Milder strains of strep bacteria are common, causing strep throat or a mild form of scarlet fever.

Flesh-eating strep had caused at least one death in Sedgwick County last year. Surgeon William Waswick said he'd seen five cases of it last year, three of them fatal.

The technical term is necrotizing fasciitis. According to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the strain that causes necrotizing fasciitis is fatal in nearly one in four cases.

The bacteria are spread primarily through wounds or cuts in the skin. If caught early, the infection is treatable, usually with penicillin.

Doctors treat advanced infections with antibiotics and cut out the infected area.

To avoid the infection, health officials suggest frequent hand-washing and not sharing toothbrushes or eating and drinking utensils. They have recommended that children be vaccinated for chicken pox, because that disease can leave children susceptible to the infection.

Lafene diagnoses case of meningitis; students should be cautious of infection

A student was diagnosed with bacterial meningitis by a physician at Lafene Health Center on Wednesday and was transferred soon after to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue, said Dr. Guy Smith, Lafene medical director.

A spinal tap performed at Mercy Health Center confirmed the diagnosis. The student immediately was placed on antibiotics to fight the disease.

Bacterial meningitis can cause hearing loss, brain damage and death if not caught early.

"Fortunately, the physician did a great job and diagnosed the disease right away," Smith said.

Smith said the student is responding well to the medication and should recover completely.

"This is a serious illness which can be fatal," he said. "But it was caught early enough, and the student should recover," he said.

Smith said the causative bacteria, which appears to be Neisseria meningitis was probably in the students throat when it infected the fluid that surrounds the brain.

"People who often have the bacteria, it is found in their throat, but it just sits there and doesn't do anything," he said.

While bacterial meningitis is contagious, Smith said the bacteria that cause bacterial meningitis can't be spread by casual contact. Students who have had class with someone who has bacterial meningitis, would not get infected just by going to class with them.

He did say, though, that those who has household contact with a person with bacterial meningitis, such as in fraternities and sororities, would be at risk of getting infected.

"It is not very contagious," Smith said. "Those at risk are those who have had contact with the infected persons oral secretions, such boyfriends and girlfriends when kissing."

Smith said those who are known to have had close contact to the student have been notified and should report to Lafene to receive antibiotics to reduce the risk of being infected.

He also said anyone who has not been contacted but has had close contact with the disease should contact Lafene, Riley County Health Department or their personal physicians within 72 hours to receive antibiotics.
